Mr. President, not only are these duties higher in this day than the advocates of protection asked for in the earlier days, but, sir, they are as high as any enlightened people, upon any theory, are justified in levying. If this industry can not sustain itself with an advantage of 49 per cent accorded to it by the law, we would be wise, sir, to withdraw the capital and labor thus employed and devote them to some less artificial and more profitable pursuit.

The people of the United States have about reached that conclusion; and if my Republican friends, who believe that a high tariff is a perpetual blessing, have not been instructed by recent events, they are duller than I think they are. The very high priest of protection on that side, when he will take counsel with calm judgment, and lay his prejudice aside, must know that the people of this country have decreed that these excessive duties must be reduced.

I can understand your obstinacy. New men have risen among you whom you seem to think are inspired by personal ambition. I am not ready to say that they are without ambition, because they have acted like men of high ambition, but also like men of honorable ambition. They have risen to contest your old leadership, and you hate to surrender it. But I tell you bluntly that you must surrender these high duties or you must surrender the leadership of your party. If you do not surrender these high duties, or if you do not surrender the leadership of your party, then you must surrender the administration of this Government into our hands.

Of course, some of you would rather see us reduce the tariff than see it done by certain men of your own party; and when you have produced more or less of friction, I am human enough and I am partisan enough to take advantage of that situation. But I have a nobler object than a mere party advantage. I want above all other things to see the burdens beneath which the industrious millions of this land are bending lifted from their shoulders. I would rather bring the people relief than bring success even to my own party, for, Mr. President, I rejoice to say that never in all of my political experience have I thought it necessary that this country should suffer in order that the Democratic Party might succeed. I would love to see these economic and industrial questions settled for a season, so that we might reconcentrate our minds upon a study and a discussion of the old and fundamental principles of this Republic. That, however, will not be done until this question is settled, and this question will not be settled until it has been settled right. We have everything to gain; we have as a party nothing to lose by the obstinate refusal of the opposition to grant this relief to the people; and yet this afternoon, even, before we adjourn, I would love to see you unite with us and send this bill to the President with such an overwhelming majority as would insure his approval of it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, we have now been in extra session for four months, and during that time we have considered three tariff bills, which have passed both Houses, and we have another under consideration. There are 13 schedules, I believe, in the tariff. If it has taken 4 months to pass 3 tariff bills, how long will it take to pass 13? I figure that, assuming that the other bills take the same relative time, we would expend 16 months of continuous effort in revising the tariff, meanwhile practically setting aside all other legislative business.

In this work we necessarily accept the conclusions of a few men, some of them experts, some of them not experts. In the House of Representatives I think that few outside of the distinguished leader of that House would be able to explain the provisions of any one of the tariff schedules that have been revised; and outside of a few men in the Senate I doubt whether there are any who have a thorough understanding, or even a partial understanding, of the bills which have been before us—such an understanding as would enable them to give an intelligent explanation of them; and I am free to confess that this criticism would apply to myself.

In this work Congress, in both Houses, has relied upon experts—unnamed experts, unknown experts. The Senators and Representatives who are responsible for these bills rely upon such experts, so that in the final analysis Congress is passing bills that have been framed by experts whose names, whose works, whose capacities, are not known to Congress or the American people.

There are some of us who for years have insisted that Congress should not waste its time and energy in endeavoring to do all of its own work, when it can get experts to simplify its labors. There are some of us who believe that Congress should not be its own secretary, that Congress should not be its own messenger, that Congress should not be its own typewriter, that Congress should not be its own architect, that Congress should not be its own engineer, that Congress should not be its own artist, that Congress should not be its own tariff expert; that there are many matters that can be intrusted to experts organized in a board or commission and operating under rules fixed by Congress. Some of us, who know how large affairs are conducted and who have been acquainted with large affairs, realize that Congress is far behind the best standards in its methods of doing business. We know that every successful enterprise of the country relies for its success upon the expert services that it secures—the best experts in the law, the best experts in chemistry, the best experts in every field of human endeavor. The methods of Congress are beyond description provincial in character, the methods that belong to the small frontier town, to the obscure country hamlet, to the ill-worked farm, to the factory ill organized for profitable production. And when we insist that there are many matters requiring specialized information, continuous research, and trained experience, which can be better administered by boards of experts acting under rules or standards fixed by law, we are reproachfully told that we favor government by commission.

But notwithstanding these discouragements, we have insisted for years that the functions of the lawmaking body are but performed by utilizing the services of experts and, finally, as the result of much effort, after long opposition by Senators such as the Senator from Wyoming, such as the former Senator from Maine, such as the former Senator from Rhode Island when the Republican Party was intrenched in power, because they knew that a competent board of experts would throw the light upon all the details of the tariff and so convince the American people of its excesses that public judgment would no longer be distracted and deceived, we have as the result a final yielding to the force of public opinion and the organization of a bipartisan Tariff Board, under weak and begrudging legislation, it is true, but with powers gradually increased by the action of the President and enlarged in the scope of its inquiries by additional appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I understood the Senator to say that I was one of those who opposed a tariff board. That may be true, but I think the records will show nothing of that kind. I do not recall any opposition on my part.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am glad to hear the statement of the Senator from Wyoming. I was alluding to the time prior to the action of Congress regarding the Tariff Board, when the Republican Party had been in power for years and had steadily refused the suggestion of a tariff board, and I presumed that the Senator, being in harmony with the general policy of his party, had joined in that resistance. But I am always glad to welcome converts, and I hope that there will be converts also on this side of the House. Public opinion is ahead of Congress upon this question. Public opinion demands that experts shall be set to work upon this important question.

Mr. President, what will be the result of these four months of continuous work? Will we get a reduction in the tariff? We are told that already the veto is prepared on the woolen bill and on the free-list bill. We are told that there will be a veto on the cotton bill if it is passed, after an effort probably requiring an extra month of work in Congress. What substantial result will there be, then, for the American people? Shall we play simply for political position in the next campaign? Shall we play to put the President in a hole, or shall we secure an honest and substantial reduction to the American people of existing duties which are oppressive and exacting? I take it that we are for the latter.

How can this be secured? The Democratic platform blazes the way. It declares for a gradual reduction of excessive tariff duties toward a revenue basis. That can be done by a simple bill which the President would not dare to veto, but which gradually and automatically in four or five years would produce a perfect tariff revenue. What would such a provision be? Why, simply the short amendment which I proposed to the free-list bill and to the wool bill, and which I was induced by those in charge of those bills not to present, because they wished them to go before the country unembarrassed by general legislation.

What is that amendment? It simply provides that where the importations of dutiable articles do not equal one-tenth of the total domestic production of similar articles the duty shall be reduced at the rate of 10 per cent per annum until the importations do equal one-tenth of the domestic production.

What effect would that produce? It would immediately attack every excessive and prohibitory duty of the tariff. Is not that what the Democrats want? Is not that what the progressive Republicans want? Can any regular or reactionary Republican say that he is opposed to turning an absolutely prohibitory duty into a revenue duty—that he is opposed to the reduction of a duty the importations under which do not reach one-tenth of the total domestic production? Could a Republican President veto such a bill or defend himself behind a veto of such a bill?

It may be said, however, by my Democratic friends that this is an indorsement of protection. It is a recognition of the fact of protection, but not an indorsement of the principle of protection. It is a recognition of the fact that protective duties exist; that they are excessive in many cases and prohibitory in others; and, recognizing that fact, this amendment prescribes action upon that fact, and declares the rule to be that upon such duties there shall be a reduction of 10 per cent per annum until the importations equal one-tenth.

But my Democratic friends may ask, "Why stop there?" My amendment simply provides that when the importations do equal one-tenth, then the matter shall be referred to Congress for its action. After the prohibitory and excessive duties are turned into revenue duties, Congress can then, if it chooses, declare that the reductions shall go on until lower depths are reached or put the articles on the free list. Meanwhile specific action upon other duties is not prevented. Throughout the entire administration of this amendment the President could act by experts in the ascertainment of the facts. The statisical bureaus of the Government will easily show the facts; the Tariff Board can inquire into the facts; and the President is required, whenever the facts are ascertained, to declare the legal result.

Mr. President, the cotton tariff bill is before us. I hope that the objection will not be made by those in charge of that bill that we should not put upon it general legislation. I hope the Senate will seriously consider putting upon that bill the amendment to which I have referred or, perhaps better, to substitute for the bill itself the amendment to which I have referred. The President may refuse to sign the cotton bill upon the same ground as the wool bill and the free-list bill, namely, that the Tariff Board has not had an opportunity of investigating and of informing Congress regarding the facts; but he can not, it seems to me, refuse to sign a bill which provides for a gradual reduction at the rate of 10 per cent per annum of the excessive and extortionate duties of the tariff under a rule fixed by Congress upon facts to be ascertained by the executive department.

It can not be pretended that such a measure will imperil any American industry. It is true we are now, as I have before said, like the man who has climbed to the highest pinnacle of a steeple, and the question is whether he shall slide down or whether he shall jump down. This amendment provides a means of sliding down; it furnishes a brake which prevents a too precipitous descent, all the way along saving the industries of the country from an inundation of foreign goods, which may temporarily paralyze production and bring about general readjustments.

The Democratic Party, radical and progressive in theory but conservative in methods, in convention assembled, has declared for a gradual reduction of the tariff to a revenue basis. Read the utterances of its leaders, from Mr. Bryan down, in the great campaigns, and you will find that that is the thing that they promised. This amendment is a fulfillment of that pledge.

I trust, Mr. President, that the Senate will seriously consider this amendment in connection with the cotton bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I know that the hour is late, but I do not intend to permit to pass unnoticed the position that has been taken on this floor, nor unchallenged the expression of any sentiment which goes to the effect of a declaration that men have the right to sit in this Chamber and vote upon matters that directly affect their individual interests. I have no desire to say anything to harass the feelings or wound the sensibilities of any man; but, sir, I say that if it is ever admitted to be within the proprieties for a man to sit upon this floor and vote for matters that particularly and directly concern his financial interests, this body will sink to a point so low in public opinion that there will be no nethermost.

I may have been trained in a very poor school, but I have been taught that the judge upon the bench who will decide a matter in which he has a financial interest is an unjust and an unrighteous judge. I have been taught to believe that a juror coming into the box must be one who has no interest in the controversy. I have been taught to believe that the law prohibits the service of an interested juror and the decree of an interested judge not so much because the framers of the law considered the judge would wittingly be dishonest or the juror intentionally swerved from a fair and just verdict, as they recognized the truth universally recognized that no man can be certain he has laid aside in the determination of a question the weight of his own personal interest. So it is everywhere written, "No man shall adjudge his own cause."

I agree that this body is here to represent the American people—all of them, and not simply a few of them; I agree that this body ought to represent all American citizens, not particular classes of American citizens; but, sir, as I have listened to these debates I have been struck with the fact that those who own woolen mills have been most active in the defense of the tariff upon manufactured woolen goods and that those who own sheep have been most intensely interested in the welfare of the sheep owners. I put it hard upon the conscience of every man within the sound of my voice whether the duties devolving upon a Senator are not as high and as sacred as those devolving upon the judges of our courts.

I have heard in this Chamber beautiful eulogies pronounced upon the bench of America, and I have joined in those eulogies, indorsed those sentiments, and applauded their utterance; and yet, sir, great as is the Supreme Court of the United States, far as we have tried to place its members above the influences that reach into the life and mind of every man, well as these judges have been trained in their profession, long as they have walked the straight path of equity and observed the bounds of justice marked by the law, fortified as they are by experience, guided though they be by precedent, example, rule of law, and the light of learning, there is not one of them who would sit in a case where he had the slightest personal or financial interest. There is not, sir, a circuit judge upon the Federal bench, there is not a district judge sitting in any of the counties of our States, there is not a justice of the peace in any enlightened community who would claim the right to decide a case in which he had a direct financial interest. If the judges of courts, then, are not above the touch of influence, and if they all shun the mere possibility of being warped in their judgment by their personal interest, I ask you what it is that has created immunity for men in this body?

I do not care how just the man may be, I do not care how he may seek to serve only his country, his conscience, and his God, there is no man who can make certain that in the end it is not his own personal interest which is controlling him, if he have a great personal interest.

Mr. President, it was in effect said by the Senator from Wyoming that men should not come to this body merely because they have had no success and have not a dollar of money. The inference was broad that those who have little money should not come at all and sit here in "the councils of the mighty." I grant you that men should not be sent here because they have no money; neither should they be sent here because they have much money nor should they get here by the use of the money. I grant you that a man ought not to be sent here because he has little money; but I say that it is as true to-day as it was in the days the sentence was uttered that "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." That ancient aphorism does not seem to apply to the United States Senate. But then sometimes I even entertain a fear that this forum does not very much resemble the celestial fields. Why did the sentence I have just quoted fall from the lips of Christ? It was said, sir, because it was true then, as it is true now, that those who own vast properties, who control immense riches, are likely to let their property interests outweigh the interest of country and humanity.

I would not attack the flocks and herds of the great West; I would not take an honest dollar from any honest man's pocket. I object to no man guarding his flocks and guarding his herds, watching them increase and multiply and bring him wealth; but I do, sir, solemnly protest against any man using the United States Senate as the point from which to subserve his personal interests. I apply that to every man who sits in this Chamber, or has ever sat in this Chamber, who votes a tax upon the people of the country when he knows that a large part of that tax will finally jingle down into his own capacious pockets.

So, since the challenge has been thrown out by the Senator from Wyoming, I venture to say that while men may rightly come to this body who possess great wealth, while men may rightly come to this body who have great property interests, yet if the proper spirit animates them, if clean ideals animate their souls, they will do as the just judge does when he finds his interests are involved in the case on trial—just as the judge will step down from the bench and refuse to sit in a matter in which he is financially concerned—so the interested Senator will step aside whenever the question to be determined directly effects his personal interests in any other manner than it effects the interest of the people of the country at large. If that be not the conscience of the Senate to-day; if the rule embraces a horizon too broad for the vision of this hour, I make the prediction that within the lives of nearly all of us you will find the rule has been adopted and obtains here without dispute and without breach.

Mr. President, I know that they have many fine flocks of sheep out in Montana, out in Wyoming, and out in the West generally; and I have been noticing, while this debate was going on, a few figures. The astonishing fact is that one-half of the sheep of the United States are found grouped in what is known as the western division, embracing Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Nevada, Idaho, Washington, Oregon, and California.

I observe, too, that the number of sheep is small in several of those States, but that when you come to Montana you find 5,372,639 sheep, in Wyoming 5,194,959 sheep, and in Utah 1,670,890 sheep. Nearly one-third of all the sheep of the United States are in those three States.

But I observe another thing. Since we are asked to protect the flocks and the herds, since we are asked to tax every boy and every girl, every babe that lies in its swaddling clothes in the cradle, and every mother of this land; since we are asked to tax the entire 90,000,000 people—none of them to escape—I challenge attention to this very significant fact: While in Wyoming they have 5,194,959 sheep, there are only 1,670 men who own those millions of sheep. That number counts every man who owns a ewe or a lamb; it counts every man who owns even one sheep. I presume that upon the farms out there, as elsewhere, many farmers only keep 4 or 5 or a dozen sheep for the purpose of raising mutton or other domestic uses. These figures, then, teach the fact, nay, make it patent, that nearly all these millions of sheep are owned by an exceedingly limited number of people. The figures also suggest, if they do not demonstrate, that the sheep are owned by wealthy corporations—not the humble farmer, not the shepherd who is struggling with adversity and contending with poverty. It is these vast corporations, owning vast herds, which they graze, I doubt not, largely upon the free public lands, that are here to-day clamoring that a tax be levied upon every rag which goes upon the back of an American citizen. They are demanding that this tribute be laid upon the industry of the land for their own particular emolument and profit.

If it is necessary to talk plain, I will talk plain. I even dare to talk for that miserable wretch who has the temerity to get himself elected to a seat in this Chamber and who does not have a vast sum of money at his back.

Mr. President, I say that here, just as in the Supreme Court of the United States; here as in the supreme courts of the various States; here as in the nisi prius courts of the land; here as in the little justice courts at country crossroads, with no light to guide save that of reason and conscience; here as in all tribunals where justice is dealt out with even hand; here, as there, when a man has a direct personal interest he ought, in all decency, in all good conscience, in all patriotism, to step aside and let those who do not have that interest settle the question in dispute.

I would not object to these interested Members' appearance before any committee, as interested parties, to present their case, although the propriety of such conduct may well be questioned, but I say we have the right to object to men sitting in this body and voting upon a question when they have a heavy financial interest to serve. Why, sir, if a man were to sit in any legislative body and take a thousand dollars for his vote, we would brand him a criminal; we would put stripes upon him and lock him in a prison cell for years of time. Because some Senators have come to this body and it has been alleged that they have offered or paid sums of money to secure votes, we solemnly investigate the question whether they shall be permitted to sit here. If it be proper to send a legislator to a prison cell because he takes a thousand dollars for his vote, will you draw me the line in the realm of conscience between the conduct of the legislator who sells his vote for money and the act of a man who sits here in the Senate and votes tens of thousands of dollars into his pockets by way of a tax levied upon those he has sworn to represent and protect?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Before I vote I want to say a word.

Mr. President, I regard this bill as pregnant with danger to the wool and woolen industry, and I shall not vote for the conference report, and I will not permit to go unchallenged the statement made in this Chamber a few moments ago that the panic of 1893 to 1897 was not directly traceable to the legislation of the Democratic Party, which enacted the Wilson tariff bill, when, in the words of Samuel Gompers, president of the Federation of Labor, there were more than 3,000,000 working men without work in this country during the period of the Wilson law, and that their employments did not return until 1897, after the enactment of the Dingley tariff law, under the leadership of the great McKinley, whose loyalty to protection was so much derided by Senators on the other side of the Chamber.

To be more explicit, Mr. Gompers said:

> That terrible period for the wage earners of this country, which began in 1893 and which has left behind it such a record of horror, hunger, and misery, practically ended with the dawn of the year 1897.

Mr. President, Grover Cleveland was elected President in 1892, and tariff revision nostrums filled the air, doubt and hesitation halted enterprise, and industry languished, while the threats of free traders were taking form, and on August 27, 1894, the infamy was perpetrated and it was so bad that even President Cleveland spurned it, although he did not exercise the veto power, as he should have done, and thus saved the country from disaster and ruin; almost every actor in that drama was repudiated by the people, and it has taken our friends upon the other side 15 years to recover from that drubbing and get up enough courage to repeat their performance. They were wrong then and they are wrong now; and I shall resist their economic rioting at every stage. Protection for the woolgrower and no protection for his customer will destroy his home market and force him to sell his wool beyond the seas in competition with his old Australian and New Zealand competitor, whom he has not met since the shade was drawn over his gaunt figure a decade and a half ago. I can see neither wisdom nor justice in this bill, while its authorship is as confusing as its provisions are misleading and inharmonious. I shall take pleasure in voting against it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on the question of agreeing to the conference report.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 15, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our Heavenly Father, broaden, deepen, and make clearer in the minds and hearts of all men right and truth, justice and mercy, that where chaos reigns order may prevail, where lawlessness runs riot and turns men into fiends the strong arm of the law may assert itself, that the horrible spectacle of torturing and burning men at the stake in this twentieth century of Christian civilization may pass into oblivion. This we ask for humanity's sake, for Christ's sake, for God's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States (H. Doc. No. 106), which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, House joint resolution No. 14, "To admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union on an equal footing with the original States."

Congress, by an enabling act approved June 20, 1910, provided for the calling of a constitutional convention in each of these Territories, the submission of the constitution proposed by the convention to the electors of the Territory, the approval of the constitution by the President and Congress, the proclamation of the fact by the President, and the election of State officers. Both in Arizona and New Mexico conventions have been held, constitutions adopted and ratified by the people and submitted to the President and Congress. I have approved the constitution of New Mexico, and so did the House of Representatives of the Sixty-first Congress. The Senate, however, failed to take action upon it. I have not approved the Arizona constitution, nor have the two Houses of Congress, except as they have done so by the joint resolution under consideration. The resolution admits both Territories to statehood with their constitutions, on condition that at the time of the election of State officers New Mexico shall submit to its electors an amendment to its new constitution altering and modifying its provision for future amendments, and on the further condition that Arizona shall submit to its electors, at the time of the election of its State officers, a proposed amendment to its constitution by which judicial officers shall be excepted from the section permitting a recall of all elective officers.

If I sign this joint resolution, I do not see how I can escape responsibility for the judicial recall of the Arizona constitution. The joint resolution admits Arizona with the judical recall, but requires the submission of the question of its wisdom to the voters. In other words, the resolution approves the admission of Arizona with the judicial recall, unless the voters themselves repudiate it. Under the Arizona constitution all elective officers, and this includes county and State judges, six months after their election are subject to the recall. It is initiated by a petition signed by electors equal to 25 per cent of the total number of votes cast for all the candidates for the office at the previous general election. Within five days after the petition is filed the officer may resign. Whether he does or not, an election ensues in which his name, if he does not resign, is placed on the ballot with that of all other candidates. The petitioners may print on the official ballot 200 words showing their reasons for recalling the officer, and he is permitted to make defense in the same place in 200 words. If the incumbent receives the highest number of the votes, he continues in his office; if not, he is removed from office and is succeeded by the candidate who does receive the highest number.

This provision of the Arizona constitution, in its application to county and State judges, seems to me so pernicious in its effect, so destructive of independence in the judiciary, so likely to subject the rights of the individual to the possible tyranny of a popular majority, and, therefore, to be so injurious to the cause of free government, that I must disapprove a constitution containing it. I am not now engaged in performing the office given me in the enabling act already referred to, approved June 20, 1910, which was that of approving the constitutions ratified by the peoples of the Territories. It may be argued from the text of that act that in giving or withholding the approval under the act my only duty is to examine the proposed constitution, and if I find nothing in it inconsistent with the Federal Constitution, the principles of the Declaration of Independence, or the enabling act, to register my approval. But now I am discharging my constitutional function in respect to the enactment of laws, and my discretion is equal to that of the Houses of Congress. I must therefore withhold my approval from this resolution if in fact I do not approve it as a matter of governmental policy. Of course, a mere difference of opinion as to the wisdom of details in a State constitution ought not to lead me to set up my opinion against that of the people of the Territory. It is to be their government, and while the power of Congress to withhold or grant statehood is absolute, the people about to constitute a State should generally know better the kind of government and constitution suited to their needs than Congress or the Executive. But when such a constitution contains something so destructive of free government as the judicial recall, it should be disapproved.

A government is for the benefit of all the people. We believe that this benefit is best accomplished by popular government, because in the long run each class of individuals is apt to secure better provision for themselves through their own voice in government than through the altruistic interest of others, however intelligent or philanthropic. The wisdom of ages has taught that no government can exist except in accordance with laws and unless the people under it either obey the laws voluntarily or are made to obey them. In a popular government the laws are made by the people—not by all the people—but by those supposed and declared to be competent for the purpose, as males over 21 years of age, and not by all of these—but by a majority of them only. Now, as the government is for all the people, and is not solely for a majority of them, the majority in exercising control either directly or through its agents is bound to exercise the power for the benefit of the minority as well as the majority. But all have recognized that the majority of a people, unrestrained by law, when aroused and without the sobering effect of deliberation and discussion, may do injustice to the minority or to the individual when the selfish interest of the majority prompts. Hence arises the necessity for a constitution by which the will of the majority shall be permitted to guide the course of the government only under controlling checks that experience has shown to be necessary to secure for the minority its share of the benefit to the whole people that a popular government is established to bestow. A popular government is not a government of a majority, by a majority, for a majority of the people. It is a government of the whole people by a majority of the whole people under such rules and checks as will secure a wise, just, and beneficent government for all the people. It is said you can always trust the people to do justice. If that means all the people and they all agree, you can. But ordinarily they do not all agree, and the maxim is interpreted to mean that you can always trust a majority of the people. This is not invariably true; and every limitation imposed by the people upon the power of the majority in their constitutions is an admission that it is not always true. No honest, clear-headed man, however great a lover of popular government, can deny that the unbridled expression of the majority of a community converted hastily into law or action would sometimes make a government tyrannical and cruel. Constitutions are checks upon the hasty action of the majority. They are the self-imposed restraints of a whole people upon a majority of them to secure sober action and a respect for the rights of the minority, and of the individual in his relation to other individuals, and in his relation to the whole people in their character as a state or government.

The Constitution distributes the functions of government into three branches—the legislative, to make the laws; the executive, to execute them; and the judicial, to decide in cases arising before it the rights of the individual as between him and others and as between him and the Government. This division of government into three separate branches has always been regarded as a great security for the maintenance of free institutions, and the security is only firm and assured when the judicial branch is independent and impartial. The executive and legislative branches are representative of the majority of the people which elected them in guiding the course of the Government within the limits of the Constitution. They must act for the whole people, of course; but they may properly follow, and usually ought to follow, the views of the majority which elected them in respect to the governmental policy best adapted to secure the welfare of the whole people. But the judicial branch of the Government is not representative of a majority of the people in any such sense, even if the mode of selecting judges is by popular election. In a proper sense, judges are servants of the people; that is, they are doing work which must be done for the Government and in the interest of all the people, but it is not work in the doing of which they are to follow the will of the majority except as that is embodied in statutes lawfully enacted according to constitutional limitations. They are not popular representatives. On the contrary, to fill their office properly they must be independent. They must decide every question which comes before them according to law and justice. If this question is between individuals, they will follow the statute, or the unwritten law if no statute applies, and they take the unwritten law growing out of tradition and custom from previous judicial decisions. If a statute or ordinance affecting a cause before them is not lawfully enacted, because it violates the constitution adopted by the people, then they must ignore the statute and decide the question as if the statute had never been passed. This power is a judicial power imposed by the people on the judges by the written constitution. In early days some argued that the obligations of the Constitution operated directly on the conscience of the legislature, and only in that manner, and that it was to be conclusively presumed that whatever was done by the legislature was constitutional. But such a view did not obtain with our hard-headed, courageous, and far-sighted statesmen and judges, and it was soon settled that it was the duty of judges in cases properly arising before them to apply the law and so to declare what was the law, and that if what purported to be statutory law was at variance with the fundamental law, i. e., the Constitution, the seeming statute was not law at all, was not binding on the courts, the individuals, or any branch of the Government, and that it was the duty of the judges so to decide. This power conferred on the judiciary in our form of government is unique in the history of governments, and its operation has attracted and deserved the admiration and commendation of the world. It gives to our judiciary a position higher, stronger, and more responsible than that of the judiciary of any other country, and more effectively secures adherence to the fundamental will of the people.

What I have said has been to little purpose if it has not shown that judges to fulfill their functions properly in our popular Government must be more independent than in any other form of government, and that need of independence is greatest where the individual is one litigant and the State, guided by the successful and governing majority, is the other. In order to maintain the rights of the minority and the individual and to preserve our constitutional balance, we must have judges with courage to decide against the majority when justice and law require.

By the recall in the Arizona constitution it is proposed to give to the majority power to remove arbitrarily, and without delay, any judge who may have the courage to render an unpopular decision. By the recall it is proposed to enable a minority of 25 per cent of the voters of the district or State, for no prescribed cause, after the judge has been in office six months, to submit the question of his retention in office to the electorate. The petitioning minority must say on the ballot what they can against him in 200 words, and he must defend as best he can in the same space. Other candidates are permitted to present themselves and have their names printed on the ballot, so that the recall is not based solely on the record or the acts of the judge, but also on the question whether some other and more popular candidate has been found to unseat him. Could there be a system more ingeniously devised to subject judges to momentary gusts of popular passion than this? We can not be blind to the fact that often an intelligent and respectable electorate may be so roused upon an issue that it will visit with condemnation the decision of a just judge, though exactly in accord with the law governing the case, merely because it affects unfavorably their contest. Controversies over elections, labor troubles, racial or religious issues, issues as to the construction or constitutionality of liquor laws, criminal trials of popular or unpopular defendants, the removal of county seats, suits by individuals to maintain their constitutional rights in obstruction of some popular improvement—these and many other cases could be cited in which a majority of a district electorate would be tempted by hasty anger to recall a conscientious judge if the opportunity were open all the time. No period of delay is interposed for the abatement of popular feeling. The recall is devised to encourage quick action and to lead the people to strike while the iron is hot. The judge is treated as the instrument and servant of a majority of the people and subject to their momentary will, not after a long term in which his qualities as a judge and his character as a man have been subjected to a test of all the varieties of judicial work and duty so as to furnish a proper means of measuring his fitness for continuance in another term. On the instant of an unpopular ruling, while the spirit of protest has not had time to cool, and even while an appeal may be pending from his ruling, in which he may be sustained, he is to be haled before the electorate as a tribunal, with no judicial hearing, evidence, or defense, and thrown out of office and disgraced for life because he has failed, in a single decision, it may be, to satisfy the popular demand. Think of the opportunity such a system would give to unscrupulous political bosses in control, as they have been in control not only of conventions but elections! Think of the enormous power for evil given to the sensational, muckraking portion of the press in rousing prejudice against a just judge by false charges and insinuations, the effect of which in the short period of an election by recall it would be impossible for him to meet and offset! Supporters of such a system seem to think that it will work only in the interest of the poor, the humble, the weak and the oppressed; that it will strike down only the judge who is supposed to favor corporations and be affected by the corrupting influence of the rich. Nothing could be further from the ultimate result. The motive it would offer to unscrupulous combinations to seek to control politics in order to control the judges is clear. Those would profit by the recall who have the best opportunity of rousing the majority of the people to action on a sudden impulse. Are they likely to be the wisest or the best people in a community? Do they not include those who have money enough to employ the firebrands and slanderers in a community and the stirrers-up of social hate? Would not self-respecting men well hesitate to accept judicial office with such a sword of Damocles hanging over them? What kind of judgments might those on the unpopular side expect from courts whose judges must make their decisions under such legalized terrorism? The character of the judges would deteriorate to that of trimmers and timeservers, and independent judicial action would be a thing of the past. As the possibilities of such a system pass in review, is it too much to characterize it as one which will destroy the judiciary, its standing, and its usefulness?

The argument has been made to justify the judicial recall that it is only carrying out the principle of the election of the judges by the people. The appointment by the executive is by the representative of the majority, and so far as future bias is concerned there is no great difference between the appointment and the election of judges. The independence of the judiciary is secured rather by a fixed term and fixed and irreducible salary. It is true that when the term of judges is for a limited number of years and reelection is necessary, it has been thought and charged sometimes that shortly before election in cases in which popular interest is excited, judges have leaned in their decisions toward the popular side.

As already pointed out, however, in the election of judges for a long and fixed term of years, the fear of popular prejudice as a motive for unjust decisions is minimized by the tenure on the one hand, while the opportunity which the people have calmly to consider the work of a judge for a full term of years in deciding as to his reelection generally insures from them a fair and reasonable consideration of his qualities as a judge. While, therefore, there have been elected judges who have bowed before unjust popular prejudice, or who have yielded to the power of political bosses in their decisions, I am convinced that these are exceptional, and that, on the whole, elected judges have made a great American judiciary. But the success of an elective judiciary certainly furnishes no reason for so changing the system as to take away the very safeguards which have made it successful.

Attempt is made to defend the principle of judicial recall by reference to States in which judges are said to have shown themselves to be under corrupt corporate influence and in which it is claimed that nothing but a desperate remedy will suffice. If the political control in such States is sufficiently wrested from corrupting corporations to permit the enactment of a radical constitutional amendment like that of judicial recall, it would seem possible to make provision in its stead for an effective remedy by impeachment in which the cumbrous features of the present remedy might be avoided, but the opportunity for judicial hearing and defense before an impartial tribunal might be retained. Real reforms are not to be effected by patent short cuts or by abolishing those requirements which the experience of ages has shown to be essential in dealing justly with everyone. Such innovations are certain in the long run to plague the inventor or first user and will come readily to the hand of the enemies and corrupters of society after the passing of the just popular indignation that prompted their adoption.

Again, judicial recall is advocated on the ground that it will bring the judges more into sympathy with the popular will and the progress of ideas among the people. It is said that now judges are out of touch with the movement toward a wider democracy and a greater control of governmental agencies in the interest and for the benefit of the people. The righteous and just course for a judge to pursue is ordinarily fixed by statute or clear principles of law, and the cases in which his judgment may be affected by his political, economic, or social views are infrequent. But even in such cases judges are not removed from the people's influence. Surround the judiciary with all the safeguards possible, create judges by appointment, make their tenure for life, forbid diminution of salary during their term, and still it is impossible to prevent the influence of popular opinion from coloring judgments in the long run. Judges are men, intelligent, sympathetic men, patriotic men, and in those fields of the law in which the personal equation unavoidably plays a part, there will be found a response to sober popular opinion as it changes to meet the exigency of social, political, and economic changes. Indeed, this should be so. Individual instances of a hidebound and retrograde conservatism on the part of courts in decisions which turn on the individual economic or sociological views of the judges may be pointed out; but they are not many, and do not call for radical action. In treating of courts we are dealing with a human machine, liable, like all the inventions of man, to err, but we are dealing with a human institution that likens itself to a divine institution, because it seeks and preserves justice. It has been the corner stone of our gloriously free Government, in which the rights of the individual and of the minority have been preserved, while governmental action of the majority has lost nothing of beneficent progress, efficacy, and directness. This balance was planned in the Constitution by its framers, and has been maintained by our independent judiciary.

Precedents are cited from State constitutions said to be equivalent to a popular recall. In some, judges are removable by a vote of both houses of the legislature. This is a mere adoption of the English address of Parliament to the Crown for the removal of judges. It is similar to impeachment, in that a form of hearing is always granted. Such a provision forms no precedent for a popular recall without adequate hearing and defense, and with new candidates to contest the election.

It is said the recall will be rarely used. If so, it will be rarely needed. Then why adopt a system so full of danger? But it is a mistake to suppose that such a powerful lever for influencing judicial decisions and such an opportunity for vengeance because of adverse ones will be allowed to remain unused.

But it is said that the people of Arizona are to become an independent State when created, and even if we strike out judicial recall now, they can reincorporate it in their constitution after statehood.

To this I would answer that in dealing with the courts, which are the corner stone of good government, and in which not only the voters, but the nonvoters and nonresidents, have a deep interest as a security for their rights of life, liberty, and property, no matter what the future action of the State may be, it is necessary for the authority which is primarily responsible for its creation to assert in no doubtful tones the necessity for an independent and untrammeled judiciary.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 15, 1911.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that House joint resolution 14, together with the message of the President just read, be referred to the Committee on the Territories. In making this motion, Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that the committee will proceed immediately to consider the resolution and the veto message and report back their conclusions without delay, in order that the Congress of the United States may have an opportunity to express its convictions upon the great questions involved in this resolution—greater questions, Mr. Speaker, than the question of whether or not Arizona shall be temporarily denied the right of incorporating the recall of judges in her constitution, if her people desire to place it there. Congress has expressed its conviction on the questions in this House by a vote of nearly 4 to 1, and the Senate by a vote of nearly 3 to 1.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is this motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. No; it is not, on the merits of the proposition. It is debatable when confined strictly to the question of reference to the committee.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I was merely making a statement, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I misunderstood the gentleman. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to refer the House joint resolution 14, together with the message of the President, to the Committee on the Territories.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege. Some weeks ago there was a good deal of newspaper and other public comment over the matter of the elimination by Executive order of some 12,800 acres of land from the Chugach National Forest on the shore of Controller Bay, in Alaska. On account of this comment the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, the Committee on Investigation of Expenditures in the Interior Department, began an examination into the question. I do not at this time expect to discuss the merits of the Controller Bay matter, but I desire to have read a resolution which was offered in this House by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] on the 9th day of August and now before the Committee on Rules, which resolution I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

House resolution 271.

Whereas by reason of Executive order 12,800 acres have been withdrawn from the Chugach National Forest Reserve of Alaska and restored to settlement, which matter is generally referred to and known as the Controller Bay withdrawal; and

Whereas it has been publicly charged that such withdrawal resulted in giving a private corporation a monopoly of the shipping facilities of said bay; and

Whereas charges have been made reflecting upon the official integrity of the President and the Secretary of the Interior and other public officials in connection with such withdrawal; and

Whereas the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department entered upon an investigation of the facts in relation to said matter; and

Whereas said committee has failed and refused to permit competent and material witnesses that have appeared before it to testify; and

Whereas said committee has abandoned such investigation; and

Whereas it is important that the facts in relation to said transaction be given to Congress: Therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department be, and it is hereby, discharged from further investigation of any facts relating to the withdrawal of 12,800 acres from the Chugach National Forest Reservation of Alaska, and to all matters in connection therewith; that a committee of five Members of this House be appointed by the Speaker to investigate all matters connected with said transaction, and to report their findings to the House, and that said committee commence immediately upon its appointment such investigation, and said committee shall have power to subpœna and compel the attendance of witnesses and to examine them under oath and to send for records, books, and papers, and all other evidence that may be necessary to make such investigation full and complete, and that the Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk to attest subpœnas during the recess of Congress. Said committee shall have authority to sit during any recess of Congress.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, using that resolution as a text, the Philadelphia Inquirer of August 11, 1911, published the following editorial, which I also send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Aug. 11, 1911.]

GRAHAM COMMITTEE SHOULD BE DISCHARGED.

The resolution introduced into the House of Representatives by Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington that the Graham committee be discharged from any further consideration of the Controller Bay slander, is one which ought most emphatically to be adopted. This committee instituted an investigation of the charge that in withdrawing the shore front of Controller Bay from the Chugach Forest Reservation, President Taft had been influenced by improper motives—that is to say, by a desire to facilitate the acquisition by the Guggenheim-Morgan syndicate of a monopoly in transportation from the Alaskan coal beds to the coast. Its intervention was induced by the publication of an article in which was incorporated the now notorious "Dick-to-Dick" letter, and its purpose obviously was, if it possibly could, to convict the President of what at the best would have been a blazing indiscretion and at the worst an official malfeasance of a flagrantly glaring character.

Although the inquiries of the committee had not gone far before it perceived the expediency of enlarging the scope of its action, so as to get as far away as possible from the original indictment, there is no room for an intelligent doubt that it was the "Dick to Dick" letter which first attracted its attention and which constituted the gravamen of the charge which it had undertaken to sustain. The whole fabric of the imaginary scandal which it scented had this letter for its basis, and the committee was therefore bound by every consideration alike of reason and of right to make this letter the starting point of its inquiry. It was bound to direct the battery of its interrogation in this direction and to satisfy itself of the authenticity or otherwise of this amazing document, in which the President of the United States was inferentially accused of disloyalty to the people with the protection of whose interests he is charged and to the great office which he occupies.

It has persistently and significantly refused to seek this satisfaction. Soon after its sessions began Secretary Fisher, of the Department of the Interior, was permitted at his own request to address it. He stated that no such writing as that described was to be found in his department and he urged the committee to call before it at an early date the person who alleged having seen and copied it there. But the committee replied that it intended to conduct the investigation in its own way, and that way was to steer off as far as possible from the line of inquiry suggested. It refused to put Miss Abbott on the stand or to call any witness who could testify upon this subject. Mr. Richard S. Ryan wanted to swear that he had never written the incriminating postscript attributed to him, but the committee would not hear him, and, after having helped by its activity to circulate an absolutely baseless scandal, it suddenly discontinued its hearings and adjourned till next October.

It was not willing that through its instrumentality the truth should be made known. It preferred, by inference, still to countenance the lie which it had hoped, but failed to substantiate. It has disgraced itself and discredited the party that it represented. It most surely ought to be discharged.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman has not stated a question of personal privilege as yet. If the gentleman desires time, I have not the slightest objection to his having time.

The SPEAKER. As there is some doubt about whether it is a question of privilege, and the Chair would have to examine very carefully what the Clerk has read, I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he ask leave to address the House.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I do ask unanimous consent to address the House on this subject.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] objects.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, how much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. GRAHAM. Oh, an hour or less.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague from Illinois shall be permitted to proceed for one hour. I suppose there will be no objection to some gentlemen on the other side having some time following.

Mr. GRAHAM. As far as I am concerned, none in the world.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. GRAHAM] may address the House for one hour.

Mr. MANN. And that I have an hour.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object unless some gentlemen on the other side have time in which to reply.

Mr. MANN. And that I may have control of one hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman amends the request by adding that he [Mr. MANN] have control of one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if half an hour is not sufficient time on each side? I want to state to the gentleman that there is some business here to be transacted of some importance to some gentlemen——

Mr. MANN. The other day I asked that the gentleman from Florida have 50 minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I simply wanted to know if the gentleman could not get through in 30 minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will get through as quickly as I can, but I doubt if I can in 30 minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Say three-quarters of an hour.

Mr. GRAHAM. Make it an hour. I do not know I shall use that much. I will get through as quickly as I can.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, in presenting this matter, and by asking unanimous consent, I do not wish to be understood as admitting that it does not involve a question of personal privilege, but it was not my purpose in rising to a question of personal privilege in any way to prevent gentlemen who differ from my view from having an opportunity to express their views. The resolution in question contains a series of whereases containing statements of fact, and the editorial accepts as facts the statement set forth in those whereases. Ordinarily I do not pay much attention to newspaper statements, and if none but myself were involved in this matter I would not pay any attention to it, but the statement made in the editorial and the statement of facts made in the resolution affect the whole committee, and that committee contains on it men of the highest honor and the highest patriotism, and I would be lacking in my duty to them as well as to myself if I did not call the attention of the House to these resolutions and the facts on which they rest. I call the attention of the House to the fact that of the seven whereases which precede the resolution five of them are entirely immaterial to this question.

The first, second, third, fourth, and seventh have really nothing to do with the matter set out in the resolution itself. They are entirely immaterial to it. The fifth says:

Whereas said committee has failed and refused to permit competent and material witnesses that have appeared before it to testify.

And the sixth says:

Whereas said committee has abandoned such investigation—

Those two whereases are the only ones that are material in the resolution, and both of them are untrue. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The resolution itself is exceedingly weak and crude. It calls for an appointment of a special committee of five, not one of the regular committees of the House, and yet there is in it no provision for expenses for that committee; there is in it no provision for a clerk; there is in it no provision for a stenographer; there is in it no provision for stenographers' fees; nor is there any provision in it for printing or preserving the evidence or even for reporting the evidence to this House. It only provides that the committee shall report conclusions to the House.

The resolution provides that it shall commence work immediately, but there is not a word in it anywhere as to either the prosecution or conclusion of the work. Our committee has already begun the very work that it calls for a special committee to do. It has begun hearings on this subject, and while there seems to be complaint that the matter has not been pushed rapidly, there is not a word in the resolution providing for a rapid hearing or a pushing of this case to a conclusion by the special committee. But I do not care to dwell upon the imperfections of the resolution and the whereases. They could be strengthened; they could be corrected by amendment. The language to which I desire to call attention is the milk in the coconut, the fifth and sixth whereases, both of which I assert are without foundation and fact.

They contain averments which reflect seriously upon this committee. The fifth whereas says that the committee has failed or refused to permit competent and material witnesses that have appeared before the committee to testify. The sixth says it has abandoned the investigation.

In making allegations of so serious a character, of course it goes without saying that the burden of proving those allegations rests on those who make them, and they would have to carry the laboring oar in this regard. But I am willing to waive that, Mr. Speaker, and I think I can convince this House, I am sure I can convince reasonable men in this House—and I am bound to assume that they are all reasonable men—and show them from the record that these averments are not true. Has the committee failed and refused to permit competent and material witnesses that have appeared before it to testify? What are the facts in that regard? The facts, Mr. Speaker, are that the committee began hearings on this question, that some witnesses were called before it, and some witnesses were heard; that then gentlemen, not of the committee, appeared before the committee and undertook to outline the order in which evidence should be produced before the committee. The committee did not see the matter that way. It thought that it should determine the order in which witnesses should appear and testify, and insisted on its right in that regard. But that did not satisfy, and now we are told in the resolution that the action of the committee in insisting that it had the right to determine the order in which witnesses would appear amounted to a refusal to hear those witnesses.

It strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that that is a most singular conclusion to come to, and I repeat here that the record will show that the committee never for a moment considered the question of abandoning this investigation or of preventing any witness who knew any facts material to the matter to testify when the time came for him to do so. A number of witnesses were subpœnaed. They appeared before the committee. The Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Fisher, made the statement to the committee that certain persons who might have knowledge on some matters connected with this investigation were about to quit the employment of the Government. He gave their names, and they were subpœnaed, and they are now under subpœna and under the control of the committee. It was suggested they might get beyond the control of the committee and then the committee would not have the power to produce them to get their evidence. To obviate that very condition subpœnas were issued and were served on every one of them, and every one of them has been subpœnaed and is now under control, and when the proper time comes will be called upon to testify before the committee. And yet it is on that situation that the charge is made in this resolution that the committee failed or refused to permit competent and material witnesses that appeared before it to testify. They were brought before it at that time, not to give their testimony then, but to be under discipline.

Mr. Speaker, some fault has been found with the committee in that it did not proceed rapidly enough. The chairman of the committee, speaking for himself—and I think he voices the sentiments of at least a majority of the committee—is clearly of the opinion that haste is not the only thing desirable in an investigation which is to be a real investigation. Indeed, the chairman is of the opinion that haste is the worst policy that the committee could adopt; that, on the contrary, it had better proceed slowly, surely, and carefully if it is to develop the real facts. It so happens that of the majority of the committee none has had experience in matters of this sort, or, if any, but very little. It involves a knowledge of public-land laws, a very intricate subject and a very, very large field. Now, under those facts and conditions the committee are more than certain that they ought not to make go too rapidly; that it is wiser to proceed slowly. It is somewhat like a man dropped in a morass in a neighborhood where he is entirely unacquainted and which abounds in pitfalls and quicksands. What should he do? Should he rush around with extreme haste?

Would not those who advise such a course be liable to the accusation that they desired failure, and that they might reasonably expect misfortune to befall him; that he would surely get into a quicksand or a pitfall? I did not say—I do not even intimate—that the gentlemen who are so anxious to hasten this proceeding would have it so in this case. But any disinterested person, stopping even a moment to think about it, must see that a committee constituted as ours is had better make haste slowly if it is to get all the facts.

Now, let us examine, if you please, some of the reasons given why great haste should be made, and see whether they are sound or not. One of them is that some of the witnesses, as I have stated, who are in the Government service have left that service and might get out of the reach of subpœna. The Secretary of the Interior appeared before the committee and made such a statement as that, as did also one of my colleagues on the committee, the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HANNA], and as did also the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], a member of the committee; but I have no hesitation in saying, as I have already said, that not one of those witnesses will escape testifying. Subpœnas were issued promptly for every one of them as soon as their names were suggested, and every one of them is now under subpœna, awaiting the desire of the committee in the giving of his testimony.

It is true some of those witnesses appeared in the committee room and were not called on to testify. Quite so; but I have just given the reason for that. They were not subpœnaed because they were expected to testify at that time, but they were subpœnaed in order to have them under control, so that they could be used when the committee in the order of its procedure reached them, and not before.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. GRAHAM. What is the question?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I desire to ask, Mr. Speaker, since the gentleman is speaking for the committee—and I am quite in sympathy with his desire to defend the committee against any improper charge—I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not the committee as a committee did any of the things that the gentleman has been describing, or whether or not——

Mr. GRAHAM. The gentleman should be more specific. I do not understand.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Or whether or not some member of the committee or a minority of the committee may have elected not to do certain things.

Mr. GRAHAM. The gentleman speaks in riddles. I do not understand, and therefore I can not answer. Gentlemen on the other side will have time and can state their case in their own way, and if I go wrong gentlemen can correct me.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Do I understand that my colleague is unable to answer my question because I speak in riddles? Is that what I understand the chairman to say? If that is the case, I would like to ask my colleague upon the committee if he will produce a record of the committee sustaining the circumstances that he has been relating.

Mr. GRAHAM. The gentleman will produce the records of the committee as he goes on in the order in which he hopes to take them up, and if, when he has concluded, the particular record which the gentleman from South Dakota has in mind has not been referred to, the gentleman who has the floor will be glad indeed if he can satisfy his friend from South Dakota.

The second reason given why the committee should be discharged, or, rather, the complaint made against it, is that the investigation might discover unfaithful employees in the Interior Department. Mr. Speaker, I think there is no merit whatever in that suggestion. It was advocated in the committee by the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. BURKE of South Dakota]. It was advanced by the Secretary of the Interior also. But, in my judgment, it is not entitled to any consideration. The Interior Department is furnished with an army of special agents and with large funds to pay those special agents for making investigations of every character, and if there were employees in that department who were unfaithful or dishonest, it certainly is not the function of a committee of this House to do for the Interior Department the work that it has men specially employed to do, and the committee declined to act upon that suggestion.

It was then urged by my friend the gentleman from South Dakota that the investigation should be pushed at once for the vindication of a young lady whose name has been mixed up in this matter, known as Miss Abbott. Now, it was extremely touching to witness the solicitude of the gentleman from South Dakota to have Miss Abbott vindicated, but it has not appeared up to date that he had any brief to undertake her defense, if she needed any, or see that she was vindicated, and the committee, in its cold-blooded fashion, was no more anxious to vindicate Miss Abbott than it was to vindicate the administration. It was only determined to go on in an orderly way and do justice to all the parties, and to see that the Congress and the people of this country knew the facts.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BARTLETT). Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I wish to say to the gentleman that I do not desire to take his time, and if I interrupt him too much I shall not think it his fault if he objects. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not the committee took any action whatever relative to any effort that may have been made by any member of the committee looking to a speedy investigation of this matter? And, if they did, I would like to ask the gentleman to produce the record of such a meeting of the committee.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, in the statement which I expected to make here it would seem as if the topic sprung by the gentleman from South Dakota would constitute a necessary element, and it does seem to me that sometimes gentlemen are exceedingly impatient when some other gentleman has the floor by insisting that he shall make his speech in the order in which they think he ought to make it, rather than in the order in which he thinks he ought to make it. I hope, in the orderly discussion of the subject, the topic mentioned by the gentleman from South Dakota will be reached, and I submit to him now that it is scarcely fair to take my time in that way. When I have finished, if I have left untouched anything that he thinks I ought to have discussed, I shall be glad to give it my attention. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In the meantime, if I were disposed to be captious, I might almost say that the gentleman wanted to consume my time. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wanted to call the attention of the House to the conditions which surrounded our committee before this matter came to our attention. We had some matters under investigation. One of them was an investigation of the Indian reservations in the Territory of Arizona. We had given it a good deal of time, but it was not finished. We had a number of witnesses here who were here at the expense of the Government. We were anxious that they should be relieved from attendance on the committee and the Government relieved of the expense. Then later, at the suggestion of the Department of Justice—indeed, at its urgent solicitation—the committee went into an investigation of the White Earth Indian Reservation, in the State of Minnesota. The committee had yet other matters going along collaterally with this one, and the committee was not in a condition to give this matter their entire time, even if they thought it wise to do it; and the chairman of the committee did not think it wise to do so. He did not think it wise to rush the matter at that time, for the reasons already suggested and also for other reasons.

In addition to the two reasons I have given for proceeding somewhat slowly, namely, the two Indian-reservation investigations which were going on, there was yet another reason, stronger than any of those, and that reason, the most important of all, was that the documents which our committee must have in order to make any intelligent progress in this investigation were not then accessible.

About the time the matter was begun Senator POINDEXTER, of Washington, introduced a resolution in the Senate calling for the documents, papers, and correspondence in this very matter. That resolution was acted upon by the Senate, and a demand made upon the President and all the departments involved to send to the Senate such documents as pertained to this subject matter.

When that matter came before our committee the Secretary of the Interior, in the statement he made to the committee said, referring to this matter—and I read from page 32 of our hearings:

Referring to the so-called "Dick-to-Dick" letter the Secretary said:

That seems to me a very serious matter, and it seems to me it has a direct relation to the prime functions of this committee in relation to the investigation of the expenditures in the Interior Department. If we have men connected with the department who for any reason would be parties to the destruction or elimination of any documents contained in the records of the department, it seems to me that is a matter that should be at once inquired into. I think—although I may be mistaken—that there is a provision in the statutes on the subject; but at any rate such a suggestion affects the efficiency of my office. It was not because of any desire to interfere with the general line of the investigation that I make this suggestion, but I do suggest that at your earliest convenience, and as soon as you do think it is proper in your investigation, you have Miss Abbott's account of the thing and such evidence as will enable us to ascertain, if we can, whether there was such a paper, and, if so, where it was and who had it when it was in existence, so we can determine the time about when it must have disappeared and ascertain exactly who had access to those papers and find out what has become of it if it ever did exist.

The CHAIRMAN. We hope to reach that, Mr. Secretary, and I take pleasure in saying to you that if, as we go along, any point develops which we think would better enable you to conserve the public interests the committee will take pleasure in informing you of it.

Mr. HANNA. It was suggested by the Secretary that some of these men, who have been employees in the department, have resigned, and that others might leave, and so on. As I understand, the men are all interested who were there at the time this matter was up in the Department of the Interior?

Every one of the witnesses suggested was subpœnaed and will be called to testify in proper order.

That statement of the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Fisher, refers to having Miss Abbott go on the witness stand then. The chairman thought her evidence did not fit at that time; that no foundation had been made upon which it would rest, and that it would put the evidence before the committee which had to study it and report upon it in the haphazard fashion of a crazy quilt rather than in an orderly and logical way.

With reference to the point I was just urging, that the documents from the Interior Department, the War Department, and the Department of Agriculture were then in use, in the preparation of the Senate document, the Secretary made the following statement, which will be found on page 26 of the hearing. There are some words in the text from which I read, which appear there because of interruptions, and which break into the continuity of thought.

I am going to leave them out as I read, and any gentleman having the record before him can follow me. Referring to these documents, Secretary Fisher said:

As you doubtless know, the Senate, on the motion of Senator POINDEXTER, has recently passed a resolution calling on the President for all of the documents relating to this matter, whether they appear in the Interior Department, the War Department, or the Department of Agriculture, and those papers are in course of preparation. I understand that everything that relates to the matter will be transmitted to the Senate at once, and it will be, of course, published as a public document when it can be made available for the committee. The reason I am interested in that phase of the matter is that Mr. Dennett, who was before you day before yesterday, called my attention to the request of the committee for copies of all of these same documents, so far as they exist in the Interior Department. Now, we have prepared and have now nearly completed a transcript of all the records in the Interior Department for transmission to the President, to be by him sent to the Senate, and Mr. Dennett wanted to know whether or not he should be instructed to duplicate that work or whether the committee would prefer to wait until the entire matter went into the Senate?

Of course, that will take a little time. Mr. Dennett's suggestion to me was that if the material went in promptly to the Senate it would probably be available in that form as promptly as we could duplicate it, but if the committee desires it we will put extra clerks at work on it and get you the information. I am here to offer my cooperation to this committee absolutely without limit and without the slightest desire to protect anybody or anything, and in the hope that the matter will be given instant attention for the purpose of getting at the entire facts.

What should the committee do in that case? What was there for them to do but to wait until that Senate document was printed?

Since that time we have been waiting, and the Senate document has not yet appeared. Last week I made three trips to the Senate to find out what I could about it. I think it was on Thursday last, or possibly Friday, I wrote to the Secretary of the Senate, and I also wrote to the Printing Office, to know when we might hope to get copies of it.

But no copy has reached me, although the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] informed us that he had seen it in print some days prior to last Thursday. I do not know why this is so. I do not know why he should have an opportunity to see these documents so necessary to our work, without which we can make no real progress, when we would not get to see it. It seems to me that this points to an additional reason, and a very strong one, why we should make haste slowly in this matter.

In addition to his statement before the committee, Mr. Fisher, the Secretary of the Interior, wrote to me on July 25, 1911, as follows:

In reply to your letter of July 24, permit me to say that it is my understanding that the President is sending to the Senate a message transmitting the papers and documents to which you refer, as well as the records of other departments concerned in the Controller Bay matter. The message itself is printed, but I do not understand that the records accompanying it have been put into type. They are quite voluminous and I assume will be printed by the Senate as an official document.

I feel quite sure that you will find in these records all that you desire in the way of documents from this department, but if upon further examination you find anything additional which you wish to obtain it will be gladly furnished if possible. I shall ask the President to send to your committee a dozen copies of the printed message.

Copies of the printed message were sent to the committee room when they were sent to the Senate and the House. But that message gave us no light whatever. It gave us no correspondence, it gave us no maps, it gave us no information so far as documents and correspondence were concerned, and so, as Secretary Fisher had said, the very information the committee must have to make any intelligent progress has been kept from it to this day, and it has not had it even yet. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And now gentlemen say that the committee should be discharged because it has not proceeded with sufficient haste, when it can not proceed without the very evidence that seems to be withheld from us, but which is furnished to the minority members of the committee.

After learning from the gentleman from South Dakota on the 10th that he had seen a copy of this Senate document in print some days before, I wrote to the Secretary of the Senate, asking him to furnish me a copy as soon as he conveniently could. Next day I received this letter from him:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
August 11, 1911.

Hon. JAMES M. GRAHAM,
Chairman Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have your letter of yesterday requesting that you be furnished at the earliest convenience with copy of the message of the President of July 26, 1911, transmitting information relative to the withdrawal of certain lands in the Chugach Forest Reserve.

The Printer reports that the proof of this document is at the department for revision and reading; that the work is being hurried as much as possible, and that the completed work ought to be available within 1 week or 10 days. It is understood that certain maps and illustrations ordered to be printed as accompaniments are in work at this time, but that their completion will delay the final publication of the document.

It will give me much pleasure to supply you with copy of the document at the earliest possible day.

Very truly, yours, CHARLES G. BENNETT.

I also sent a copy of the same letter to Mr. Donnelly, printer expert. I have not heard from him yet, and I have not seen a copy of this Senate document yet, until I saw this moment the copy exhibited by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE]. I refuse to believe that the Secretary of the Senate or the printer expert have of their own motion withheld this document from the majority of the committee while furnishing it to the minority of the committee.

What will honest men, who believe in a square deal, think of such methods?

Secretary Fisher said—and everyone agrees with him—that the committee should have the printed Senate document to proceed intelligently.

The gentlemen who urge haste have had that document and they know we have not got it, and now they make a howl about delay. O ye hypocrites!

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM. No; I have used considerable of my time, and I desire to reserve some of it for reply.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GRAHAM. Now, Mr. Speaker, since this episode occurred our committee has been holding sessions from time to time. We have been acting under the strain and stress which all the Members of Congress have been in not knowing when the adjournment would occur. We could not proceed by bringing witnesses from a distance, by keeping them here on expense, without some knowledge as to how long Congress might be here.

It was the sense of the committee that when Congress should adjourn the committee should also adjourn, to convene during vacation at an opportune time. The committee has taken action, and has decided that the chairman should call the committee together during the vacation. The sense of the committee as expressed in its action was that the call should be made some time about the 1st of November. The action taken does not bind the chairman. The committee adjourned to meet at the call of the Chair, and the Chair has discretion in that regard, and while the committee expressed its sense, as I have stated, to meet about the 1st of November, if any exigency should arise to make it desirable to meet earlier, the chairman has the power to call it together earlier.

The chairman of the committee says now, as he has said in open committee and elsewhere repeatedly, that this investigation is not abandoned, that there never was any thought on the part of the committee to abandon it. The committee insists and the chairman insists that the investigation shall be orderly, that it shall be thorough, and that some time shall be taken in advance by members of the committee who are not familiar with the documents in the department, who have no clerks at their disposal who are familiar with the documents, who were present at the making of them or the receipt of them in the department and know them as we know the alphabet, and who are not interested, and—I say it with all due respect—not interested in bringing all the evidence before the committee. The committee needs to proceed carefully and it will proceed carefully, and it hopes to let the light shine on every crevice of this matter. It hopes to give Congress and the country all the facts concerning it. It does seem a little strange to the committee that this Executive order, dated October 28, should enable a man away out on Controller Bay to have a survey made and make locations on three different quarter sections on the fourth day after the Executive order was signed at Washington. There is in it matter worthy of investigation, but an investigation made in haste by a committee unfamiliar with the facts and the environments would be no investigation at all, and it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the administration itself and those who stand with it should want this investigation made under circumstances which would be entirely free from suspicion, free from undue haste, free from inadequacy or defect of any sort. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM. State your question.

Mr. MONDELL I desire to ask the gentleman if, before he concludes his remarks, he intends to state the efforts that the minority Members made to have the investigation continued?

Mr. GRAHAM. The minority Members have time at their disposal, and I suppose they will state such facts as they desire to state. I shall reserve some of my time to reply to those statements.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM. Not now. There is but one other point to which I want to refer at this time, and that is the reason put forth to the effect that the administration has been assailed through the newspapers in this matter, and that it is due to the administration that the matter be investigated as promptly as possible. With that I entirely agree. I say that it should be investigated as promptly and as thoroughly as possible—as promptly as a thorough investigation will permit. I take it that the administration has not suffered any in this regard. It is claimed that the administration was assailed through the newspapers by the publication of what has been called the "Dick-to-Dick" letter.

But the President of the United States has made this matter the subject of a message of 23 printed pages. In that message he has given his view with great elaborateness. It has gone to the country very, very generously. It has been published everywhere. I do not assert it as a fact, for I have not personal knowledge of it, but I have fairly good information, enough to justify me in saying that this message or the substance of it has been reduced to plate matter, and that those plates have been sent to the country press of the United States at a cost which is practically nothing. In addition to that, I have information which I deem reliable that a number of Government clerks who are being paid by the Government for doing other work have been employed continuously in mailing these messages of the President to the people of the United States. Therefore I think it fair to assume that the reason given, namely, that the administration and the President should be vindicated loses most of its force in view of those conditions. Wherever the statement went, I take it the contradiction has followed. Those who saw the accusation have doubtless seen the defense. Indeed, I may say, I think, without going outside the limits of the reasonable, that the defense, the message of the President, has reached many, many persons and many places where the charge itself has never been either seen or heard; hence that as a reason for undue haste falls to the ground with the others.

Mr. Speaker, that is all I desire to say at this time, and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question purely for information?

Mr. GRAHAM. Perhaps the gentlemen on the other side will be able to answer the gentleman from California out of their time.

Mr. KAHN. I doubt whether anybody but the chairman of the committee could.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM. Not at this time. I do not care to consume any more of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield and reserves the balance of his time. The gentleman has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest and pleasure to the gentleman's apology for the action of the committee. I had hoped that before he sat down he would make some explanation or give some reason for its action. In the first place, the gentleman starts out and criticizes the wording of the resolution. I admit that the criticism is just. I dictated the whereases of that resolution to my secretary, and then told her to use resolution No. 103, the resolution under which this committee has assumed to act, for the rest of it, and, of course, I made a mistake when I followed that Democratic resolution. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman's apology for the committee not proceeding is because, as he says, there are certain papers that the President has sent to the Printing Office, and that he is waiting for copies of them. The original papers in that matter were within the reach of this committee at any time they desired to use them.

I have been informed that this committee has not met since the 21st of last month to consider this particular question. I have also been informed that before this committee has appeared the Secretary of the Interior. I have the hearings here which show that that is true, and that he asked permission to testify. I am also informed that Ashmun Brown was before that committee; that Don M. Carr was before that committee; and that Delegate WICKERSHAM, from Alaska, was before that committee; that Mr. Ryan, the supposed writer of the notorious postscript, was before that committee; and that Miss Abbott was before that committee, and has been several times since. It was upon noting these facts that I introduced this resolution. I want to thank the distinguished chairman of the committee for the opportunity that he has given me to speak on this resolution. It is not necessary to say that as far as the gentlemen who comprise that committee are concerned I have the highest regard for their integrity in every respect, and anything I may say does not reflect upon them personally in the least. I had long given up hope of ever being able to speak upon this resolution, but since it is brought before the House I take pleasure in stating now some of the reasons why I introduced it, and some of the reasons why I think it ought to be passed.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question? He stated that certain witnesses were before the committee. Were they permitted to testify?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They did not testify. I will not use that expression, that they were not "permitted" to testify.

The whole Pacific coast, and especially the State of Washington, is vitally interested in the development of Alaska. To a great extent the prosperity of the Pacific coast depends upon the future of Alaska. We are more interested in the development of Alaska than in any other portion of the country, and we are more interested in knowing if there is any foundation for the hysterical claims by certain so-called conservationists that Alaska is likely to pass into the control of great corporations. It has recently been charged through the public press and given wide publicity that Controller Bay is one of the keys to the future transportation of Alaska, and that this bay, by the act of the Interior Department and the President, had been turned over to a private corporation and such privileges granted to it as to permit it to have a complete monopoly upon said bay; that by this act the rights of the people have been disregarded and the future development of Alaska threatened.

It has been directly charged that the President of the United States, at the instigation of his brother and with full knowledge of the situation, in order to help certain private interests, secretly made an order setting forth certain lands for the express purpose of giving what is known as the Morgan-Guggenheim syndicate a monopoly and control of this bay.

The whole country is familiar with these charges. The President was directly assailed. He was accused of improper and dishonest motives. The Committee on the Expenditures in the Interior Department, by virtue of House resolution No. 103, assumed jurisdiction and authority to investigate these charges. This committee, with much blare of political trumpets, with hysterical publicity and glaring headlines in the saffron-hued uplift press, started to investigate these matters and to give the truth to the public. It no longer holds meetings. The headline had disappeared in the sensational press. Suddenly "the shouting and the tumult ceases." And this committee begins to look for excuses to postpone and delay, and are now using every endeavor, if I am correctly informed, to prevent further hearings. What is the matter? The witnesses were before this committee. Why were they not examined?

The Secretary of the Interior asked that Miss Abbott be placed upon the witness stand. Why was it not done? What has caused this sudden change of attitude? What has come over the spirit of the dreams of these enthusiastic investigators? What has so suddenly happened to cool their patriotic ardor? What is the reason that this committee does not want to hear the evidence? Does it want to give the truth to the country?

By their action they have helped to give wide publicity and attention to a most scandalous and scurrilous attack upon the President. Is it possible that they are now willing by their action to protect those who are responsible for these charges? Do they wish by their inaction to protect those who by forgery and villification assassinate the character of public men? Delay can benefit only those who have something to conceal. No honest man can object to the immediate and complete truth being made public. [Applause on the Republican side.] To delay without cause this investigation can not be in the interest of honesty. Again I ask, What is the matter that no further proceedings are being taken? Are the tracks of villification and slander leading in the wrong direction? [Applause on the Republican side.] What has happened that the truth is no longer desirable to those who are so eager to investigate these irresponsible charges? Is the famous and infamous "Dick-to-Dick" letter an ordinary and stupid forgery, misshapen and untimely born of the distorted and distempered imagination of an irresponsible, hysterical, petticoated muckraker, or was she only the unsuspecting and innocent tool of designing enemies of the President who were too cowardly to strike except from the dark and from behind. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHARP. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not wish to yield now; I may have time later.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. This is a question that this committee can settle very quickly. This is the question in which the people are interested. This is the question: If the President is guilty of the things directly charged in that letter, which no person in the United States believes, then he is unworthy of his great office. The people of the country are entitled to know upon what ground such charges are based. It will not do to say that these charges made are immaterial now after the committee has given them sufficient weight to start upon an investigation. If the committee takes this position, that this letter was an infamous forgery, then why do they not inquire into who was guilty of such criminal methods to traduce the President and to cast a shadow over his great reputation?

The pretended discoverer of this letter was before the committee, and Secretary Fisher asked that she be placed upon the witness stand and compelled to give the truth in relation to the transaction. She has visited the committee since. Why was this not done? What excuse can the committee give for its failure to place this witness on the stand and submit her to cross-examination? Why is not the truth in relation to this letter given to the public now? It is due not only to the country and to the President and to other public men involved that this should be done, but if she be honest, and it is to be presumed that she is, it is due to the woman herself. Where did this woman first get this letter? Who first told her about it? Where is it now? Who has seen it? If it is a forgery, did she do it herself, or was it inspired by some one else? It does not take any maps to place this witness on the witness stand to answer questions. No documents are necessary for the committee in order to ask her in regard to this letter. Again I ask, Why did not the committee place this witness on the stand and let the country know the truth?

That this letter is a forgery no one doubts. What object can there be in keeping from the public all the facts concerning it? Certainly it can not be that the committee fears that some "higher up" may become involved in the transaction, or that some political conspiracy may be revealed to discredit the President.

As the country is at a loss to understand why this, the only witness, so far as known, that ever saw this letter is not compelled to testify, it is also at a loss to understand why the committee refuses to hear Mr. Ashmund Brown, former secretary of Secretary Ballinger and of Secretary Fisher. Why was he not permitted to tell his story? Why is it that Mr. Don M. Carr, formerly connected with the department, was not placed upon the witness stand?

Why was not Mr. Ryan, reputed author of this letter, compelled to give his side of the controversy to the committee?

It is well known that all these gentlemen are soon to go to the Pacific coast.

Was it the hope of the committee that something might transpire before next October that would cause the testimony of these witnesses to be unavailable?

Was it the hope of the committee that by waiting until next October something might prevent these witnesses from again appearing before the committee?

Why was it that Delegate Wickersham was not placed upon the witness stand and given an opportunity to tell what he knew about the transaction? He claimed to have very important information bearing upon the question. Why is it that he was permitted to leave for Alaska without an opportunity to give to the public his statement?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; yes, I will.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman heard the chairman of the committee say that this was not the orderly time for an investigation of that evidence. Now, let me ask the gentleman whether, in his opinion, if the forthcoming evidence had been against the President of the United States this orderly method of procedure would have still been maintained?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In answer to that I will say that the chairman of the committee stated that he wanted to construct his building in an orderly and symmetrical way, and my answer to that is that this letter is the foundation of the charges; and the further answer is that it is impossible to construct a symmetrical building that rests upon a foundation of falsehood and forgery as do these charges. [Applause on the Republican side.] And I am utterly unable to imagine any reason why they refused to permit the testimony of this woman at this time, consistent with a desire to let the country know the facts about this letter.

Again I ask what is the purpose of delay? Is it to give some witness time to get beyond reach, or the hope that something may transpire that will cause their evidence no longer to be available? Is it to give some interested party time and opportunity to cover up his guilty tracks?

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHARP. Will the gentleman yield just for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I decline to yield at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If anything wrong has been done, let us know it now.

If any officer in this Government, even the highest, has failed to do his duty toward Alaska, let us know it now.

If any company has been given privileges in Alaska that it should not have been granted, let us know it now in order that such privileges may be withdrawn.

If anything has been done in relation to Controller Bay that is antagonistic to the interests of the people, let it be known now, while there is still time for Congress to act, and while we still have power to abrogate any privileges that may have been given. In order that Congress may act to right any wrong it is vital that the facts be known promptly.

If, on the other hand, it be true, as has been charged, that these attacks upon the President is a political conspiracy to discredit him, and the expressed desire to protect Alaska is only a pretense to accomplish this purpose, then let it immediately be known to the country.

If it be true that these imputations, as has been charged, are inspired by those who have great interests in the East, and are for that reason opposed to the development of Alaska, then these facts should be made known. If it is influence that has induced this committee to suddenly stop this investigation, let that fact be known.

If any and all of these charges are false, then let that fact be known. No honest man can object to the truth. Whatever the facts may be, there is no justification for the delay of this committee in their investigations.

The people of Alaska are American citizens. They went there having faith in this Government, having faith in the honesty and in the integrity and intelligence of Congress. They have been patient and long suffering, and they are entitled to relief, and entitled to relief now. The delay of this committee in this investigation is another obstacle to immediate help to the people of Alaska.

If the Controller Bay affair is worthy of investigation at all, it is vital that it be done at once. If the committee has discovered that all the charges made in relation to this controversy are false, as their action seems to indicate, then let them have the courage to make a report to this effect at once, that Congress and the country may have the truth.

I am not now discussing what the real facts in this controversy may be; but whether the President has made a mistake or whether the accusations against him are false and inspired for political purposes, or whether such charges are the work of great interests in the East opposed to Alaskan development, whatever the truth may be, there is no justification for delay in investigating the matter. I care not what excuse may be given, there can be, and there is, but one reason for such delay, and that is the desire to conceal the truth for the benefit of some one. For some reason it is desired to keep the facts from the public.

Can it be that the committee, having gone so far, has discovered that the charges made against the President are false, and that they now think that delay may leave some stain in the public mind upon the President?

I can not believe that such motives control the majority of the committee. I am sure that such actions, if inspired by such motives, would be condemned by the majority of the Members in each party. Partisanship so indecent will never meet the approval of this House.

In conclusion, I may say that I have examined with some care the facts in this case and I have some personal knowledge of the situation. I am satisfied that the President acted knowingly; that he acted with caution; that he acted with a full knowledge of the situation, and that he acted wisely. I am satisfied that he did not intend to give anyone the power to control the transportation facilities of Controller Bay, or to do anything that would be to the disadvantage of the public. I am satisfied that had he desired to grant a monopoly of the transportation facilities upon Controller Bay that he would have been entirely powerless under the law to do so. I am satisfied that the public interests in this transaction have been fully conserved; that all charges against the President are wholly without foundation. But whatever the truth may be, it is of highest importance to the public, and especially to the people of Alaska, that all the facts in relation to these charges should be made public at the earliest possible time. In reality the question now is not a question of Controller Bay or of conservation. The public mind is satisfied upon that proposition. The issue now is the great name of the President of the United States.

Shall a committee of this House be permitted by delay to deliberately assist those who would besmirch the name of the President? This is the question now involved in the action of the committee.

The American people are familiar with the record of President Taft. The American people approved and admired him as a great and just judge. The American people watched and approved his great work in the Philippines. The American people watched and approved his action in regard to the construction of the Panama Canal.

The American people watched and approved his remarkable success in Cuba. The American people put their seal of approval upon his splendid record as Secretary of War. From the day when he resigned his office as judge and at the request of the martyred McKinley went to the Philippines and took up his hard task, the whole world has known, watched, and applauded the career of William H. Taft. [Applause on the Republican side.] No man in the history of this Republic ever bore a more stainless reputation; no man ever stood higher in the confidence of the American people as to his honesty, integrity, or sincerity of purpose. Some men may not agree always with his judgment, some may differ with him on questions of policy, but no honest man doubts the honesty of William H. Taft. [Applause on the Republican side.] And this committee has committed a great wrong and they stand discredited before the American people when by their inaction they give their indorsement to the cowardly, dishonest, and dastardly attempt, by falsehood and forgery, to discredit that great and splendid character who is now President of our country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, to show what some of the newspapers of the country think of the action of the committee, I will insert in the RECORD several editorials on the question:

[Editorial from the New York Tribune, July 26, 1911.]

TRICK-TO-TRICK.

In response to the demand of Representative BURKE of South Dakota that "the searchlight should be turned on now" upon the Controller Bay affair and the "Dick-to-Dick" letter, the chairman of the investigating committee, Mr. GRAHAM, said yesterday that "it was better to proceed in October." Of course; better to let the sinister accusations already spread on the record stay there unproved for three months, in the hope that they will leave an impression which would be effaced, and something more, if they were promptly refuted; better to be unfair, to employ cunning and play the sneak than to ascertain and publish the facts as soon as possible; better to act in a public matter affecting the reputation of public men as no man could act in a private relation without becoming an object of scorn and loathing; better to let accusers down easy through delay than to run the risk of making them contemptible; better to perform a political trick for what there may be in it than to show an honest zeal for the truth.

In our opinion Mr. GRAHAM will find that his calculations are erroneous; that the country will not forget, but remember; and that it is not "better to proceed in October."

[From the Post-Intelligencer, Seattle, Friday, Aug. 4.]

COWARDLY POLITICS.

The refusal of the GRAHAM investigating committee to hear testimony in regard to the notorious "Dick-to-Dick" postscript, said to have been found in the letter files of the Interior Department by Miss Abbott, a magazine writer, is a display of infamous unfairness, and shows the length to which some Democratic statesmen will go in efforts to serve the party to which they belong.

Mr. GRAHAM says the matter is not of sufficient importance to warrant further investigation. Why not? This mean forgery has smirched the reputations of men whose characters are supposed to be above reproach. It went to the disgusting and contemptible limit of dragging the President's name into an unclean controversy. Is it Mr. GRAHAM'S idea that reputation is no longer of any consequence in this country? Doesn't he put any value on character?

Among men who are entitled to the respect of their fellows character is about the only thing that counts; it is the "immediate jewel" of the souls of manly men.

If the GRAHAM committee and their muckraking aids on the outside had dismissed the entire Controller Bay fake as of no importance in the beginning, before they had gone to the mean extreme of smirching the names of honorable men, they would have deserved the commendation of the American people, and they would have received it.

But that isn't the Democratic way of doing things; that at any rate isn't Mr. GRAHAM'S way of doing things, for he doesn't care anything about a man's character, he doesn't care anything even about the President's character, if he can gain some narrow political advantage by assailing it.

But Mr. GRAHAM and his blind followers will gain nothing by tactics of this sort. The American people are fair and just, and they have not yet reached the low state that would cause them to regard reputation and character as of no importance in the day's events. Cowardly politics of the GRAHAM sort will make no headway in America.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Monday, July 24, 1911.]

A COMMITTEE'S RANK PARTISANSHIP.

Such rank partisanship as is being shown by the House committee which is conducting the Controller Bay investigation has seldom been exhibited. This inquiry was originally induced by the publication in a local newspaper of what purported to be a copy of a document on file in the Department of the Interior made by one Miss M. F. Abbott. Miss Abbott claimed to have discovered some suspicious irregularities in connection with the opening to public entry of a triangular piece of ground which formed part of the Chugach National Forest, of Alaska, and which had a frontage of 8 miles on Controller Bay, a large inlet from the Pacific Ocean. She had written a "story" on this subject, for which she finally found a purchaser, and an important, because a sensational, feature of what she wrote was what has since become known as the "Dick-to-Dick" postscript. It is supposed to have been addressed to former Secretary Ballinger under date of July 13, 1910, and reads as follows:

"DEAR DICK: I went to see the President the other day. He asked me whom I represented. I told him, according to our agreement, that I represented myself. But that didn't seem to satisfy him. So I sent for Charlie Taft and asked him to tell his brother (the President) who it was I really represented. The President made no further objection to my claim.

"Yours, "DICK."

The scandal mongers who seized upon this choice morsel for exploitation presented it as evidence that the President's order of October 28, 1910, opening to entry the Controller Bay tract, had been prompted by a desire to promote the institution by the Guggenheim-Morgan syndicate of a monopoly in the transportation of coal from the principal Alaskan beds to the seacoast. The intimation was that when the President learned that "Dick" was acting for the Guggenheim party he made the desired release. This means that the President was accused of having exercised his authority for the benefit of a private interest at the public expense. There could hardly be a graver charge, and it demanded an immediate and unsparing investigation. Well, the Graham committee met, and on July 12 Secretary Fisher, of the Interior Department, appeared before it and testified that no such document as Miss Abbott claimed to have copied could be found on the files of his department. He urged that Miss Abbott be interrogated with regard to it at an early date. The committee gave him no satisfaction. It has not called Miss Abbott yet, and, according to report, is not intending to call her, and its chairman now insists that the "Dick to Dick" postscript, which was made the occasion of the abuse of which the President has in this connection been the object, is of no importance anyhow.

In the meanwhile, Richard S. Ryan, the supposed "Dick" of the transaction, has denied ever having written the alleged letter, has denied having any acquaintance with Charles P. Taft, the President's brother, has denied any connection with the Guggenheims, and has denied ever having asked the President for any favors. He is still waiting a chance to testify and his wait is likely to be a long one. A deliberately scandal-mongering committee, which has lost all its interest in the "Dick to Dick" letter, doesn't want to hear him.

Indeed, it has no consuming desire to hear anyone. It seems to have had enough, and on the pretext that Mr. Louis D. Brandeis, whom it has invited to help it out of its difficulties, can not sooner attend, it has postponed any further hearings until next October, when it is dollars to doughnuts that the investigation which has so signally failed to produce the desired results will be conveniently forgotten. It is as though a ragamuffin should throw a handful of mud at a passer-by and then dodge round the nearest corner.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Thursday, July 27, 1911.]

WHY THE CONTROLLER BAY INQUIRY WAS DROPPED.

Chairman GRAHAM of the committee which has been investigating the Controller Bay fake, refused to give any good reason why the witnesses who for several days have been waiting to be heard with regard to the "Dick to Dick" letter should not be allowed an opportunity to testify, but he did confirm the report that the inquiry had been postponed until October, and the public can form its own conclusions as to the rest.

Of course, the fact is that Mr. GRAHAM and those Democratic associates of his who thought they saw a fine chance to besmirch the President and to discredit his administration have discovered, to their disgust, that they have been following a false scent. They have promoted by their proceedings the dissemination of a scandalous story, according to which the President deliberately exercised his official authority to promote the purposes and interests of a monopolizing combination, and now they have discovered that there is nothing in it, that it is a lie made out of the whole cloth. That is why they have lost interest in the case and why the investigation has been postponed until next October, when it can be quietly dropped without its abandonment attracting attention.

Mr. GRAHAM explained that he and his fellow inquisitors were intending to study the entire Alaskan situation. So they should, for it is a subject on which Congressmen appear in desperate need of enlightenment. But that is no reason why this Controller Bay business should not be taken up and settled right now. The honorable, the honest, the decent, the only fair thing for the committee to do, after having given circulation and a kind of indorsement to the "Dick-to-Dick" insinuation, would be to turn the light on the situation which has been created and to make a frank, open, unreserved exhibition of all the facts. The young woman who says she copied the incriminating writing from a paper on file in the Interior Department should be called to the stand and invited to tell all she knows. It has been suggested that the committee thinks she might not withstand the strain of the cross-examination to which she would be subjected, but if she is telling the truth she has nothing to fear, and if she isn't she deserves no consideration.

Mr. Richard S. Ryan wants to swear that he never wrote the alleged "Dick-to-Dick" postscript; that he has only a formal acquaintance with former Secretary Ballinger and would not think of addressing him so familiarly; that he never asked any favor of the President; that his application was made through the regular channels in the ordinary way; and that he has no connection with the Guggenheim syndicate, but represents a rival concern. The committee is in honor bound to hear Mr. Ryan forthwith. It is also in honor bound to give Mr. Ashmun Brown, who was Judge Ballinger's private secretary, a chance to say under oath that although all the papers in the Controller Bay case passed through his hands he never saw the "Dick-to-Dick" postscript and does not believe such a document ever existed. That is what the committee would do if to ascertain and enunciate the truth were its real object. Such, however, is not the case. It cares only to discover and disseminate a scandal, and it had no use for the Controller Bay incident upon discovering that there was no scandal there.

[Editorial from the Washington Post, July 27, 1911.]

CONTROLLER BAY.

President Taft's message to the Senate on the Controller Bay affair is a crushing reply to the muckrakers who have taken shreds of truth and dovetailed them with brazen falsehoods in the effort to besmirch the administration.

It is shown that there has not been and can not be any transfer of Controller Bay to the Morgan-Guggenheim or any other company; that Congress retains control of the approaches to the channel of Controller Bay; that only a limited portion of the land above high water (4 miles from the channel) may be located by any person or corporation, with alternate portions reserved by the Government from location by anyone; that the land between low and high water can not be obtained by anyone without specific act of Congress; and that the President carefully considered all applications before throwing open lands from the Chugach Forest Reserve and took steps to give everybody a chance to open up the country without special favors to anyone.

It is further shown that the "Dick-to-Dick" letter was a fabrication, invented by some muckraker for the purpose of bolstering up the charge that the "Guggenheims" had gobbled Controller Bay. Charles P. Taft never had any communication with Ryan, and knew nothing of Controller Bay. Former Secretary Ballinger never received such a letter, and was away on a two months' vacation when it is alleged to have been written.

A more thorough sweeping away of false and malicious rubbish was never accomplished than Mr. Taft has accomplished in this message. He speaks with dignity, but the force of his plain unfolding of facts completely demolishes the cunning fabrication contrived by those who tried to make it appear that the President was a party to the betrayal of the Government in its Alaskan property.

The President does well to give Alaska the benefit of a few truths, for that unhappy district has been befogged so long by liars and muckrakers that its development has been halted and its prospects greatly damaged. This admonition from the President's message is well worth heeding:

"The helpless state to which the credulity of some and the malevolent scandalmongering of others have brought the people of Alaska in their struggle for its development ought to give the public pause, for, until a juster and fairer view be taken, investment in Alaska, which is necessary to its development, will be impossible, and honest administrators and legislators will be embarrassed in the advocacy and putting into operation of those policies in regard to the Territory which are necessary to its progress and prosperity."

[From the Seattle Times.]

GOOD REASON FOR INVESTIGATION OF ALASKA CONDITIONS—"DICK-TO-DICK" LETTER CHARGES OPEN WAY FOR FAR-REACHING INQUIRY INTO CAUSE OF TROUBLE IN NORTH.

[By J. J. Underwood.]

The congressional investigation into the Alaska coal-land controversy, precipitated by charges to the effect that former Secretary of the Interior Ballinger and Charles P. Taft had entered into a conspiracy to defeat the Government of ownership of alleged valuable shore land at Controller Bay, Alaska, according to dispatches received from Washington, has resulted in the bars being thrown down by the probing committee, and it has been resolved to thoroughly inquire into every ramification of a problem that bids fair to become a national issue.

The Times presents herewith a number of facts pertaining to the Alaska coal-land situation and its bearing upon the contracts for furnishing fuel to the United States warships plying on the Pacific Ocean, and upon western conditions generally. The Times presents also certain statements which have been made from time to time in connection with the activity of the adherents of the conservation movement. These will be forwarded immediately to Washington and presented to the probing committee for investigation.

FOREIGN SHIPS—AMERICAN COAL.

Nineteen foreign vessels are now chartered and on the way from Newport News and other Atlantic ports to San Francisco and Puget Sound ports. These vessels are laden with coal from the Pocahontas fields, to be delivered at the Government naval stations.

The ships carrying Government cargo are being operated in violation of the Federal law, which prohibits foreign vessels engaging in coastwise trade.

This should be investigated.

The aggregate freight bill to be paid by the Government for the cargo carried by these 19 ships is approximately $600,000. The Government pays annually to the owners of foreign vessels a haulage bill of more than $1,000,000. These ships carry nothing but Pocahontas coal.

This coal either should be carried on American ships or the law prohibiting vessels from plying between American ports should be repealed. Under the present conditions the money paid to foreign shipowners by the American Government for hauling naval coal amounts to a Government subsidy to foreign shipowners.

Foreign ships chartered to carry coal to the Pacific Ocean for use on American war vessels, on arrival at their destination, are thrown on the open market, and having received what amounts to a ship subsidy from the Government, American merchant marine is unable to compete with them.

The committee might look into this matter.

WHAT GOVERNMENT PAYS.

The Government pays $8.80 for Pocahontas coal delivered at San Francisco, and a higher rate for delivery at Puget Sound ports. Government engineers have reported that Alaska coal, of better steaming quality and of a higher percentage of efficiency for all purposes, can be delivered on Puget Sound at $4.90 and at San Francisco at a slightly increased cost. By using Alaska coal in United States warships the Government could save more than $1,000,000 per annum.

This should be investigated.

In the event of war with a foreign country that would invade the Pacific Ocean, American war vessels would be without fuel, except such as could be dragged around Cape Horn or across the continent.

The best method of maintaining peace, it is generally admitted by war experts, is to constantly maintain a condition of readiness for war. And opening and operating Alaska coal fields, with several coaling stations, would give the Pacific coast cities greater assurances of protection.

This is a condition the committee might investigate.

It has been publicly charged that the Forestry Department has expended large sums of Government money in exploiting by publicity the views of ultraconservationists, and that in this manner an effort has been made to build up a big political machine. Is this true?

Let the committee ask some of the settlers living along the edge of the various forest reserves.

OTHER CHARGES MADE.

It has been charged that the efforts of the forestry press bureau have been accelerated by efforts on the part of publicists working in the interests of the owners of the Pocahontas coal fields, of the British Shipowners' Association, of the steel interests of the Eastern States, of the Weyerhaeuser Lumber Co., and of certain railroad companies; it is further charged that these interests have worked to keep the Alaska coal out of competition on the Pacific coast markets, particularly in regard to fuel furnished the United States naval vessels.

It has been stated that the Enos estate, in which former Chief Forester Gifford Pinchot is a beneficiary, is interested in the Pocahontas coal fields and in the Pocahontas Sales Co. It also is charged that his interests are identical with those of the Weyerhaeuser Lumber Trust.

The committee by investigating along these lines might throw a new light on the conservation movement.

George W. Woodruff, an Attorney General of the Interior Department, who was recommended to the office by Gifford Pinchot, soon after being forced to resign by Secretary Ballinger, became the secretary-treasurer of the Pocahontas Sales Co. It is claimed that Pinchot obtained this position for Woodruff.

Let the committee find out why Pinchot is so friendly toward the Pocahontas Co.

In the event of the Alaska coal fields being opened, the freight between Puget Sound and Alaska could be reduced one-half. Under the present conditions ships plying northward from Puget Sound return in ballast, thus making the freight charges for the northward trip pay for the return trip when nothing is carried. This is an injustice to the people who are trying to develop Alaska, and the committee should take some steps to remedy it.

Residents of Alaska during the past 10 years have paid an aggregate of approximately $7,000,000 for coal purchased in Canada. They also have paid a duty of 40 cents the ton thereon, and this in spite of the fact that Alaska is underlain with countless millions of tons of the finest grade coal—an anomalous situation.

Let the committee look into it.

The census reports show that Alaska's population has increased only 767 in 10 years, while the population of contiguous territory in Canada has increased by the immigration of American citizens at the rate of 11,800 per month. Many Alaskans who made fortunes in the gold mines of Alaska, and seeking investment in agricultural land, took their money to Canada.

The committee should seek an explanation of this condition.

FOREST-RESERVE DEAL.

The forest reserves in Alaska have been extended over large areas of country where there is not one stick of growing timber. It is charged that in many instances the reserves were extended to keep prospectors from locating coal lands. Only one-fifth of the known coal areas of Alaska have been located; the balance is locked up in the forest reserves. Although application was made as long as six and seven years ago, none of the lands located have been allowed to go to patent.

Let the committee find out why.

While an abundance of superdeveloped timber lies rotting in Alaska, no man is allowed to cut timber without first getting a permit from the Government and paying a stumpage duty. Millions of railroad ties and telegraph poles were imported from Oregon and Washington to Alaska, involving much unnecessary expense, and subserving no purpose except to help deplete the forests of the United States.

Let the committee find out why this condition has been allowed to exist.

It is contended by some legal authorities that forest reserves in Alaska have no legal existence. The law allows the Executive to extend the creation of forest reserves to the "Territory of Alaska." Some courts have ruled that Alaska is a district. What is the legal status of Alaska? If it is a district, the Government has defrauded Alaskans of money collected for stumpage.

Let the committee look into this matter.

RAILROADS HELD UP.

While the Government has rendered assistance to railroads constructing lines in the United States and in the Philippines, it has levied a duty of $100 per mile per annum on railroads constructed in Alaska. The users of the railroad must pay this license. As Alaska has no vote in the Electoral College or in Congress, and as one of the fundamental principles of American Government is that there shall be "no taxation without representation," it leaves a question as to whether the Government has flimflammed the Alaskans out of this and other license fees.

Let the committee inquire into this.

Telegraph and cable tolls between Seattle and Alaska, mile for mile, are 280 per cent higher than in the United States. The Alaska cables and telegraph lines are operated by the United States Government. Let the progressive members of the committee find out why the Government is allowed to charge a telegraph toll which it would not tolerate on the part of the telegraph companies in the United States.

QUESTIONS OF LAW.

Five different Federal officials, each charged with judicial powers, two judges of the Federal court and three successive Secretaries of the Interior, have rendered five different interpretations of the law in regard to Alaska coal-land cases.

Let the committee recommend the enactment of a law that will enable the Supreme Court to settle this matter, the matter of the alleged illegality of the forestry reserves and the judicial status of Alaska, once and forever.

It is contended that the courts of justice and not the executive departments should be the final arbiters of the rights of the Alaskans. To leave the final determination of a matter so far-reaching in its importance as is the Alaska coal-land problem to the head of a department of the Government, who has undertaken to carry out what is believed to be an unwise policy, is manifestly unjust and un-American in principle.

Let the committee recommend that this matter be put up to the Supreme Court of the United States.

It has been charged that the decision in a recent coal-land case, made by the Interior Department, was guided by political expediency and not by the facts and the law.

Let the committee find out whether this be true—and if it be, send the case before a judicial tribunal for retrial.

If the decision of the commissioner of the General Land Office in the case referred to is carried to its logical conclusion, every prospector in the United States will be compelled to develop a producing mine before he can obtain a title to his property. This is manifestly impossible, and ends further development of properties to which title has not been granted.

Let the committee find out why this new interpretation was placed on the law.

One railroad operating in Alaska, after building 79 miles of track, was compelled to suspend because of the heavy cost of Canadian coal. This company has stated its willingness to put up a bond to build 500 miles of railroad in Alaska within five years if 1,000 acres of Alaska good coal land is opened to entry. Let the committee investigate this offer, and, if it is legitimate, see that it is carried out.

It is charged by competent mining engineers that the lack of a fuel supply in Alaska has caused a stagnation of business conditions, has forced many good citizens into bankruptcy, has inflicted untold hardship upon them, and has practically blotted off the map many places that once were prosperous settlements. Is this true?

It is asserted also that while the opening of the Alaska coal fields would decrease the dividends of the foreign shipowners, the Federal Steel Corporation and many other financial interests which are centered in the Eastern States, it would greatly increase the manufacturing business and general prosperity of the Pacific coast and Western States. It is contended that the manufacturing business can not be successfully engaged in on the western slope of the Rocky Mountains because of the heavy transportation bills on hard coal and coke.

Let the committee look into this, and they may find some milk in the conservation coconut.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, how much time has the gentleman consumed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has occupied 23 minutes, and has 7 minutes remaining.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD some editorials and some newspaper clippings upon this question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE]. [Applause.]

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this debate and would not do so were it not for the fact that my colleague on the committee the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] has referred to me in person, and because of the fact that he has made certain statements as to what the committee had done without distinguishing between the majority and minority members thereof, and because of the fact that the distinguished gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], who has just taken his seat, has cast aspersions and reflections upon the committee as a whole, and I being a member I feel compelled to say something.

I want, Mr. Speaker, to disclaim any responsibility whatever for anything that has transpired or that has not transpired since the 20th day of July in the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department so far as the Controller Bay matter is concerned. And I want to say further that in the statements made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], the chairman of the committee, when he said repeatedly that the committee had taken certain action or that the committee had done certain things, if the statements are true they are without any knowledge on my part, because the committee, as a committee, has taken no action at any meeting that has been called in the usual way, and I think the chairman will substantiate my statement when I say that I have attended every meeting of that committee since I became a member thereof.

Now, Mr. Speaker, just a few words about what has transpired. I was appointed upon the committee on the 19th day of July or, in other words, I was elected by a resolution of the House, offered by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], my name probably having been suggested by the distinguished minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

I attended the first meeting of the committee after that date, which was on the 20th day of July. I found that the committee was engaged in hearings upon the subject of Controller Bay, and had had several hearings. I did not have an opportunity to read the hearings at that time, except very hastily to glance over them. I attended the committee meeting on the 20th day of July, at 10.30 o'clock in the morning, and I found there, in addition to the members of the committee, the several witnesses whose names have been mentioned by the gentleman from Washington, and I am not going to take the time to name them all; but Mr. Ryan was there and Miss Abbott was there and Mr. Ashmun Brown, former private secretary to Secretary Ballinger; Mr. Don M. Carr, of the Interior Department; and Mr. Delegate WICKERSHAM were there, as well as others. The committee was slow in beginning work, but finally, at about half past 11, a witness appeared from the Forestry Bureau and occupied the witness stand until 15 minutes after 1 o'clock in the afternoon.

The record shows that at that hour the committee adjourned to meet on Friday, at 10.30 o'clock—the next day. At 10 o'clock the next day I was phoned by the clerk of the committee that there would be no meeting, and that there would probably not be a meeting until such time as the chairman determined, and that I would be notified. There was no meeting on that day and there was no meeting on the following day, which was Saturday; neither was there any meeting on Monday, which was the 24th of July. There was no session of the House during that period except a short session on Saturday, lasting only nine minutes. On Tuesday morning, the 25th, the committee assembled, pursuant to the call of the chairman, and when the committee got ready to proceed to business we were informed by the chairman that we were to consider a question involving an Indian reservation matter in Minnesota. At that time, Mr. Speaker, it seemed to me, after all that had been stated in the press of the country, and in view of the statement made by the present Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Fisher, before the committee on one of the former hearings as to the importance of this Controller Bay inquiry proceeding while the witnesses were available that then was the time to go on with it and to continue the inquiry until we had gotten the facts pertaining to the whole matter.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I presumed, very modestly, as a new member of the committee, to interrogate the chairman, and in Hearing No. 6, I think it is, on this subject, will be found what occurred upon that occasion.

I have not the time, Mr. Speaker, in the short time allowed me, to read what occurred, but the Members of the House by sending for these hearings can find out. But the sum and substance of what I did say, Mr. Speaker, was to state what the conditions were, referring to the fact that the Secretary of the Interior had been before the committee; that the witnesses were then there, some of whom were about to leave the Government service; that I, as one member of the committee, wanted to go to the very bottom of the matter; in other words, I wanted to go to the root of it. I further stated that I wanted to turn on the searchlight, and I wanted to do it then, and I have been endeavoring as best I could to force the committee to go on with the investigation ever since.

For the information of the House I will insert the proceedings on that occasion as shown by the printed hearings. They are as follows:

WHITE EARTH RESERVATION.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES
IN THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Tuesday, July 25, 1911.

The committee met at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Hon. JAMES M. GRAHAM (chairman) presiding. There were present also the following members of the committee: Messrs. GEORGE, HENSLEY, and BURKE.

There were also present Hon. Robert G. Valentine, Commissioner of Indian Affairs; E. B. Merritt, law clerk, Indian Office; Thomas Sloan, attorney at law; and Mrs. Helen Pierce Gray.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen, I suppose you know we are here this morning to listen to Judge Burch.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, in advance of what you are going to consider this morning, I would like to inquire what has become of the Controller Bay inquiry, or the Alaskan matter?

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by that, Mr. BURKE?

Mr. BURKE. I understood that the committee were engaged in the investigation of certain charges that have been made with reference to Controller Bay, in Alaska, and that it was the intention—at least I got this from the record—to pursue the inquiry, and do it diligently; and on Thursday last, the 20th instant, the hearing was for the purpose of conducting that inquiry, and a recess was taken until Friday morning at 10.30. Later the members of the committee were advised that there would be no meeting, and this has been the first meeting since. I am simply inquiring as to what has become of that matter?

The CHAIRMAN. Nothing has become of it; it is just where we left it, and, of course, will stay there until taken up again. The reason for the gap in the proceeding is the delay in the report of the President or the Secretary of the Interior, or both, in answer to the Senate resolution. That document was to be filed on Friday last, I heard, but it was not, and I understand will not be until to-morrow. That document will contain a great deal of information about papers and documents which we hope to use; and in order not to annoy or inconvenience the department, I thought it better to wait until they got that off their hands before asking them for such documents as we need. As soon as that document is out, it will probably take a little time to study it, see what it contains that we think we would need, and also what it does not contain that we think we would need; and as soon as that is done it is the intention of the Chair, so far as he is concerned, to get that documentary evidence into the record—all of it.

Mr. BURKE. In reading the record—and I know the Chair will take into consideration that I have been a member of this committee but a short time, and therefore have to ask for information that I might otherwise be possessed of——

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE. On the 12th I notice the Secretary of the Interior appeared before the committee and urged that this matter have a very thorough and prompt investigation, and called attention to what I believe to be the case, and I guess there is no dispute about it, that, so far as any claims have been filed upon or any effort to file upon any claims, they have not matured; and that it is very important if anything has transpired there which is reprehensible or iniquitous, as the newspapers would seem to indicate, it should have investigation immediately, in order that if the public interests have been jeopardized in any manner, we may prevent the consummation of any attempted acquiring of land contrary to law.

I also notice in this statement of the Secretary that he calls attention to some witnesses who are important, some who have left the department, and others about to leave, and that he believes, so far as the one feature of the matter is concerned, it ought to be inquired into at once in order that witnesses may be obtainable who know the facts. I refer to Ashmun Brown, who was formerly secretary to Secretary Ballinger, and Mr. Don M. Carr, who was assistant to the Secretary, who, I understand, is about to go to California. A newspaper article has stated that a certain Miss M. F. Abbott found in the records a certain letter, known as the "Dick-to-Dick" letter. It is denied that any such letter was there.

It seems to me, in justice to Miss Abbott, we ought to make an inquiry in regard to that letter; and in view of the fact that all of these witnesses whom I have named, including Mr. Ryan, whom I believe was subpœnaed, are here, I can not understand why we should delay this matter; and as one member of the committee, I want to say that I want to turn on the searchlight and go to the very bottom of every suggestion that has been made with reference to the Controller Bay affair, and I believe there has been enough said about it in the press of the country so that the country is demanding an immediate investigation; and I would not make this inquiry as I do if I had not read in the papers that it was the intention not to take this matter up perhaps until October. I was advised by one member of the committee that he has been so informed through his secretary, who is alleged to have conferred with the chairman, that it was not to be taken up until October; and I want to say that I hope that that is not the case, and I hope that we may go ahead with this Controller Bay inquiry at the very earliest date and make it a special continuing order until completed, except as it may be postponed by action of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. BURKE, let me inquire, in connection with the Secretary's statement before the committee on the day of the second hearing, did you also read the reply of the chairman to the Secretary on that occasion?

Mr. BURKE. Yes, sir; I certainly did.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman indorses now all that he said then, and has very little to add to it. As to the point you make that this investigation ought to be pushed so that the Interior Department might know if there is anything fraudulent in the Controller Bay claims, I think that a most astonishing statement. In my short experience with the department I have never known the department to rely on a committee of the House for information concerning the character of claims. The General Land Office is thoroughly, perfectly equipped with special agents whose duty it is to investigate the validity of claims, who have every facility, who can go on the ground, who have practically unlimited money to expend in that work, and who can, if they desire, or if the department desires them to, find out every detail about it; and there is no machinery in the law or in the Government, in the practical application of the law, which requires a committee of Congress to make investigation as to the validity of claims in order to enable the department to know whether those claims are valid or invalid. I therefore must dissent very strongly from the suggestion which you make, whether it comes from you or from the Interior Department, that this committee resolve itself into a special agency for the purpose of investigating the validity of claims pending in the Land Office. I think you will agree with me in that view. Whether you do or not, I think the view is sound.

As to the witnesses whom the Secretary suggested should be subpœnaed, they have been subpœnaed. All of them he named have been subpœnaed and are now under control of the committee, and at the proper time will be called. They are released temporarily, but not discharged, a difference which, of course, you clearly recognize. I am sure that the chairman quite agrees with you, and is glad to hear you say what he would expect you to say, that the searchlight should be turned on this matter to the fullest possible extent. But, from your experience in Congress and your experience as a lawyer, you must know that to turn the searchlight on a matter of this involved character so as to see into all the recesses will take time, and the chairman, so far as he can do it, proposes to give it the necessary time and to get into every crevice with the searchlight; and he is glad, indeed, to know what he would have expected in any event, that you will aid in that work. But it will have to be done in an orderly manner. As the chairman said to the Secretary of the Interior on a former occasion, there is, in his judgment, a best way to go at it. The Chair's opinion is that the best way to proceed now is to get into this record every bit of documentary evidence which there is available and obtainable, and if the Chair can have his way about it, all that will be done, if possible, before the adjournment of Congress.

The chairman thinks that, then, the majority of the committee desires to go home and stay there at least awhile during the hot weather, and when the weather and the circumstances are more favorable, that the committee return at some opportune time—October would be a good time—and have all the witnesses here ready to push the hearing of the oral testimony to a conclusion as rapidly as possible, and in such order as at the time will appear to the committee most logical and most effective.

Mr. BURKE. I think the Chair misunderstood my suggestion that this inquiry ought to be continued only for the purpose of aiding the department.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; if you did not say that, the Chair misunderstood you.

Mr. BURKE. This inquiry, or rather the suggestions that have prompted this investigation, suggest that the department is not properly conserving the public interests, and that they have, by some irregular and unusual proceeding, permitted lands to be acquired that ought not to have been acquired; and Congress, that has absolute control over the public domain, when its attention is called to anything of this kind, should promptly investigate it for the express purpose of preventing the consummation of what it is said is improper. I had no thought of conducting this inquiry for the purpose of aiding the department or the General Land Office. I do not care anything about them. I think that Congress itself, and certainly the country, want to know something about this affair.

The CHAIRMAN. Just at that point, the chair will again state that he does not understand that your present statement of your position accords with your first statement of it, and the record will show the fact that you did suggest that this committee assist the department in determining whether a fraud was about to be committed. Now, which of us is right as to that matter is, of course, immaterial; the record will show that.

Mr. BURKE. That might be one reason.

The CHAIRMAN. But on the other point you make you are mistaken, as the chair sees it. Congress is not supreme in the matter of which you speak. If a location was made on Controller Bay by some one having soldiers' additional homestead scrip, Congress could not interfere with that. Congress can not, by any power that I know of, deprive a man of his property lawfully obtained; and no investigation which Congress could now make along that line would have the effect of depriving a man who had lawful claims on Controller Bay of those claims. So that that could not be a reason, if I am right about it, why we should go into an inquiry of that character, which could lead nowhere.

Mr. BURKE. The investigation would probably disclose that.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; and I hope an investigation will.

Mr. BURKE. Has it occurred to the chair and the other members of the committee that, in view of the fact that it is asserted that certain interests, known as the Alaska Syndicate, are perhaps back of this matter, the failure on the part of the committee to act promptly might be thought to be prompted by some action on the part of that syndicate and therefore embarass the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the committee has not any such thought as that. I do not think it at all likely that anyone would be of the opinion that the majority of the committee is here to aid the Alaska Syndicate. If anyone is of such opinion, I hope that before the investigation is over such person will have ample cause to change his mind.

Mr. BURKE. The chair thinks, then, it is very possible that that impression might prevail as to the minority?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the chair thinks that extremely improbable, if not impossible.

Mr. BURKE. Just another word. As I understand the chair, in his own opinion, as a member of the committee, he thinks that after reaching a certain point in this investigation it might be well to postpone the continuance of it until some time later in the season; that to be a matter to be brought to the attenton of the committee for its action, I assume.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is entirely in control.

Mr. BURKE. I supposed that was the case, and I would not have made this inquiry had I not read in the papers that the committee had decided to put this over until October, and I was not aware that the committee had so acted; and if they have so acted, I would like to be advised.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman neither owns nor controls any paper.

Mr. BURKE. I understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. And is not informed as to what has appeared in the papers, and the chairman has never assumed to be the committee.

Whenever he made a statement the chairman was always very careful to say that that was merely the opinion of the chair.

Mr. BURKE. I have no doubt that is the case. I would like to make one further inquiry for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. BURKE. I notice that in a number of its hearings counsel appear for the committee. In the Controller Bay matter one Mr. Fennell, I believe, is the name. Will the chair state, for my benefit, what the relation of Mr. Fennell is to the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. In that Controller Bay matter Mr. Fennell's relation to the committee I could not state; I do not know that he had any. In matters pertaining to the General Land Office Mr. Fennell represented the committee.

Mr. BURKE. Do I understand that is by employment by the committee, or voluntarily?

The CHAIRMAN. I hardly know whether to call it employment or not. Mr. Fennell will get some remuneration.

Mr. BURKE. I notice that in the hearings it says "There were present," naming the members of the committee, "and Mr. W. P. Fennell, attorney at law, Washington, D. C., on behalf of the committee." I simply wanted to know his relation to the committee, so that I might consult him the same as any other member if he is employed by the committee; and I think in these investigations, where a subject is of enough importance, counsel can be of assistance to the committee. But I wanted to ask of the chair if the committee has authority to employ counsel.

The CHAIRMAN. From whom do you mean when you say authority?

Mr. BURKE. I assume that it could not have authority from any other body except the House itself. I know no precedent where a committee has had authority to employ counsel——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not quite agree with you in that regard.

Mr. BURKE. Perhaps the Chair can inform me; that is what I want to know.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose that the contingent fund of the House might be used in that way without specific permission from the House. What does Mr. Burke think about that?

Mr. BURKE. I would think that the precedents would require action by the House to authorize the employment of counsel, except, possibly in investigations where the resolution is broad enough to authorize the employment of counsel, as may be the case in the sugar and steel inquiries, where they are authorized to expend $25,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Then I am right, am I, in understanding you to say that, in your opinion, the contingent fund of the House, or any part of it, may not be used for that purpose?

Mr. BURKE. I should say it was very doubtful.

The CHAIRMAN. If it is doubtful——

Mr. BURKE. I want to say—and I am saying this in entire good faith, for the benefit of the Chair—that that question came up in the last Congress in the committee that investigated the Steenerson matter, and I think that was the ruling of the Committee on Accounts. I do not wish to be objecting at all to the committee having counsel.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not the fact, but the manner of it, that you are suggesting doubts about now?

Mr. BURKE. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything further that you wish to inquire about now that we have a catechising spell on?

Mr. BURKE. I think the Chair will, as I have already stated, recognize the fact that I am a new member on this committee, and necessarily must make inquiries to get certain information that I would be cognizant of if I had been a member from the beginning.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has no secrets. Anything you wish to inquire about, you may do so freely.

Mr. BURKE. I have nothing further.

Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding my demand to take up the Controller Bay matter, we proceeded to inquire about the Indian-reservation matter in Minnesota, and we ran along, holding sessions for two or three or four days on that matter, and finally we got to a stopping point, when I again made some further inquiries of the chairman about the Alaska affair. I had been reading in the press of the country a great deal about it. I had read in the newspapers that the hearings had been postponed by the committee until October. I had also read in the newspapers that some attorney—one Brandeis—had been employed by the committee.

This was on the 27th of July, and to show exactly what I did say and what transpired I will quote from the hearings of the committee on that day the proceedings as they appear in the printed report of the hearings, as follows:

WHITE EARTH RESERVATION.

IN THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Thursday, July 27, 1911.

The committee met at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Hon. JAMES M. GRAHAM (chairman) presiding.

The following members of the committee were present: Messrs. FERRIS, GEORGE, HENSLEY, and BURKE.

There were also present: Thomas Sloan, attorney at law; E. B. Merritt, law clerk, Indian Bureau; and Mrs. Helen Pierce Gray.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question simply for information. Some days ago I saw in the papers that one Mr. Brandeis had been engaged by this committee as counsel, and the evening paper last night published a statement that that was the fact, or that he had been engaged for the committee. Simply for information, I would like to know what is his relation to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is your inquiry for information or publication? If your inquiry is for information, it ought to be asked in executive session; and if it is for publication, we ought to know it. As to the things that appear in the newspapers——

Mr. BURKE (interposing). I saw the publication in the paper, and certainly thought there would be no harm in inquiring about it.

The CHAIRMAN. That is quite true. The chairman has not paid much attention to the publications in the papers. For instance, the Chair saw in one of the papers the statement that a vacancy was made on this committee and that you were put here to represent and defend the administration. Now, the Chair would not pay any attention to that statement, and it would seem as if everything that appears in the newspapers ought not to be made the basis of inquiry in an open meeting of the committee. If it is merely for information——

Mr. BURKE (interposing). I will make the inquiry in executive session if there is any reason why it should not be made in open meeting. It did not occur to me that it was a matter that necessarily should be confined to executive session. I have no desire to embarrass the chairman by asking the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman is not embarrassed; not at all. The chairman merely wants to know, Mr. BURKE, whether this inquiry which you make is for your personal information or for publication. If it is made for publication, the committee ought to know it; but if it is made for your personal information, then it had better be made in executive session.

Mr. BURKE. I do not think the Chair is justified in making the suggestion that he has made about the question. I stated that the purpose of the question was for information; and if it will help the matter any, I will reiterate my statement that it is for information.

The CHAIRMAN. In response to that statement, the Chair would have to reiterate that some inquiries for your personal information had better be asked in executive session. In this case the Chair has no hesitancy in answering your question. Mr. Brandeis has not been engaged by the committee, but the chairman of the committee hopes that Mr. Brandeis will give his services to the committee.

Mr. BURKE. That is all I want to know. I am not in any way intending to cast any reflection upon the chairman or the committee for employing Mr. Brandeis or anybody else, but having seen it in the papers, not once, but several times, I thought it was entirely proper to make the inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that everything that appears in the papers is hardly a proper subject of inquiry in open meeting, just as the chairman has intimated with reference to the statements about you. The Chair would not think of making such an inquiry as to that.

Mr. BURKE. If I ask questions that the Chair thinks are improper, I hope the Chair will respond by saying that he prefers to have the question asked in executive session.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman has said so.

Mr. BURKE. Then, it is your desire that I ask questions only in executive session?

The CHAIRMAN. That depends upon the nature of the question. If it is made for personal information, you ought to make it in executive session. If it is a matter you wish to get in the newspapers, and you desire to ask it when the reporters are here, it is perfectly proper to ask it in their presence.

Mr. BURKE. I do not care for that feature of it. I simply wanted information, and it is usual when information is wanted in a committee to inquire for it.

The CHAIRMAN. That has not been my experience, and I think the rule I have suggested is the correct one.

Mr. BURKE. I can not see any possible reason why this course would be improper—that is, to make the inquiry in full committee. If it is, I want to know it, because it is not my intention to violate the usual customs that prevail in the committees of Congress. I have had some service on committees. I think I know my rights, and if there is anything that can possibly suggest that any question of this kind is improper I can not conceive what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has expressed his view about it, and must leave the rest to the discretion of the members of the committee.

Mr. BURKE. That is all I care to ask about.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything further—is there any other question?

Mr. BURKE. I have no further questions.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They already had one attorney.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I knew, Mr. Speaker, that the committee had no authority whatever to employ counsel. I thought, however, that if it had employed counsel, as one member of the committee I was entitled to the benefit of his services, the same as the other members. I also thought it was very strange if this matter had been postponed until October, when there had been no meeting of the committee and when there was not a majority of the members of the committee in the city, not counting the minority members, and I had consulted them, and they had informed me that no person connected with the committee had made any suggestion to them about postponing the consideration of this matter and they had not attended any meeting of the committee at which I had not been present. Mr. Speaker, there is one thing that I omitted to say. When I attended the first meeting of the committee on July 20 I found that it did have counsel and had had counsel ever since the inquiry began. If you will take the six pamphlets which contain the printed report of these hearings on Controller Bay you will find at the head of each day's proceedings the statement that besides the members of the committee there was also present Mr. W. P. Fennell, attorney at law, on behalf of the committee.

That is another reason why I say, if the statements made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] are correct, that if the committee itself or the majority members thereof did not feel capable of assuming the responsibilities of their positions and were not able to conduct the hearings they already had able counsel, and there was absolutely no excuse for any postponement.

The chairman of the committee [Mr. GRAHAM] has stated that they were waiting for some record that was ordered printed in the Senate, and that they had not been able to obtain a copy of it. He had reference to the exhibits referred to in the President's message in response to the Poindexter resolution. Then he referred to me and stated that I had suggested that a printed copy might be obtained, but that he was unable to obtain a copy. Mr. Speaker, whether or not a copy could be obtained at that time I do not know, but I was informed that such was the case. I sent for a printed copy and obtained it. I hold in my hand Document No. 77, Sixty-second Congress, first session, Chugach national forest lands in Alaska, containing all of the exhibits that were attached to the President's message referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM]. I do not know when it was printed, but I was informed that I could have a copy of it at any time. Here it is if anyone wishes to see it.

But, Mr. Speaker, what difference does it make whether that document was printed or not? It was the duty of the committee, if it desired to examine any of the files in either of the bureaus or departments of the Government on this subject, to summon the heads of those departments and bring before the committee the original files, and not wait for a printed copy in the form of a Senate document. It seems to me that it would be the duty of the committee to see and examine the original documents. And I say, with all due deference to my good friend from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] that I very much fear that his statement that the delay was due to being unable to get this printed document is without very much foundation, and that in fact there is some other reason that he does not care to disclose as to why the committee dropped the matter. There has been no reason that I can see why the hearings should not have gone on from the time I went upon the committee on the 20th of July.

But suppose it was the judgment of the committee that it ought to be postponed until some time later in the year. Is there any reason, can anybody conceive of any reason, why a motion could not be made to postpone it, so that each member of the committee might have an opportunity to vote his convictions upon the matter and know what was going to be done? No; we were unable to get any information except such as I have indicated from the press of the country.

On Wednesday of last week I recited the facts and circumstances pertaining to this matter, going at some length into the details, and then offered a resolution, and moved its adoption, that this subject be made a special order, and that it continue from day to day until the investigation was completed unless postponed by order of the committee. Without reading the several whereases, here is the resolution:

Be it resolved, That the Controller Bay matter be made a special order; that all witnesses who have heretofore been subpœnaed be required to appear forthwith, and that the hearing continue from day to day until a thorough, full, and complete inquiry has been made of the whole subject, and that there be no postponement thereof except by order of the committee.

That is the only motion that has been made in the committee since I became a member thereof upon this subject. What do you think happened? Instanter the chairman of the committee declared my motion out of order, and the committee went into executive session. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that on every occasion, in season and out of season, since July 20 I have endeavored to get the committee to go ahead with this investigation; and I also want to say that there is no other member upon the committee who is more anxious or desirous or who will be more zealous or who will attend committee meetings any more regularly or any more hours in the day or any oftener than I will in order that we may get at the actual facts in this Controller Bay affair. I will say, further, that I have no person to favor and no one to shield, but will go into a full and thorough investigation and get all the facts, letting the chips fall where they may. Are you gentlemen of the majority of the committee willing to do likewise? If you are, then why not go ahead? Let us proceed now and not wait until the witnesses may be where we can not get them. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois where the witnesses are now? Some of them are in California, coming this fall clear across the continent if they are summoned. It is my honest judgment, though, that they never will be summoned; but if they are, then they will come a long distance at the expense of the United States, when only recently they were here upon the ground and actually in the presence of the committee, ready and anxious to give their testimony, but were denied the privilege. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, we have heard much about economy in this Congress. I simply ask the House and the country to wait a few months and see what the results of these several investigating committees will disclose, expenditure committees taking jurisdiction of subjects that they absolutely have no jurisdiction of at all, committees constituted by a membership in large part that know nothing about the subjects that they propose to inquire into, summoning witnesses from all over creation at very great expense, employing counsel to aid them in their work, with no authority whatever for taking jurisdiction of the subject matter or for employing counsel.

But I apprehend that they will find some way after they get through of meeting these expenses and paying counsel, and they will go into the Treasury of the United States and appropriate the money to pay them.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman name some of these committees to which he refers?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps if I was going to name them the easiest way would be to name all of them.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Would the gentleman name the Steel Trust and the Sugar Trust investigations?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The committees to investigate the Sugar Trust and the Steel Trust are special committees, constituted and authorized to proceed by resolutions of the House, and I do not believe they are exceeding their authority. I am talking about these expenditure committees. I believe there are nine of them.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Is the gentleman opposed to the investigation of the Sugar Trust and the Steel Trust?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I am not opposed to any honest investigation.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes; for a question.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman is making the point that this committee did not have jurisdiction under the rules of the House to make this investigation.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I never raised the question of jurisdiction so far as this inquiry is concerned. Inasmuch as it had assumed jurisdiction when I went upon the committee, I was desirous that it might proceed, but I say to the gentleman from Georgia that the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, or the committee on expenditures in any other department, is absolutely without any jurisdiction to investigate the President of the United States.

Mr. BARTLETT. In that opinion I thoroughly agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. This committee has no more authority to investigate him than it would have to investigate the Supreme Court of the United States and inquire into its motives in rendering some decision which that great court may have rendered in some important case; but it took jurisdiction, and it was my desire that it might proceed. I assumed that the committee would do so, and therefore I have never at any time suggested a want of jurisdiction. I was willing to waive that question. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, I am naturally interested in the charges that have been made to the effect that that committee has not performed its duty touching the so-called Controller Bay matter. I confess at the outset that I have possibly not performed my full duty in the matter, for it happened that in the lull of the legislative proceedings about the 1st of July I absented myself temporarily from these legislative halls and betook myself homeward.

While home I heard that the committee had taken up the investigation of the elimination from the Chugach forest reserve of certain lands bordering on Controller Bay, and my return was urged. I wired to my secretary, asking him to make inquiry in regard to the matter. That was about the 20th of July. The committee had been conducting hearings at various times, beginning about the 10th of July. The last hearing, which is printed in pamphlet No. 6, was held July 20. On the 22d of July, I think it was, my secretary wired me that, after consultation with the chairman of the committee, the chairman had informed him that the committee would suspend its investigation of this subject until October.

Pressing legislative matters brought me back to the Capitol, and soon after my arrival, about the 1st of August, I attended a committee meeting and found it was investigating matters touching the White Earth Indian Reservation, matters which it did not seem to me were within the jurisdiction of the committee. Nevertheless that subject was being considered, and at the close of that meeting the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] made some observations touching the Controller Bay investigation and suggested that the committee continue that investigation. The chairman of the committee, for reasons which he then expressed and which he has again expressed to-day, declined to approve the continuation of hearings on the subject.

We of the minority—and I include all the members of the minority, because we all held substantially the same view of the matter—called attention to the fact that grave charges had been made against a number of Federal officials, and particularly against the President of the United States; that, really, the important matter for investigation was the truth or falsity of these charges, because upon the proof or disproof of these charges depended the question as to whether there was any foundation whatever for the general charges that had been made. If the claims made with regard to the so-called "Dick-to-Dick" letter are true, then the President of the United States was guilty of conduct certainly unbecoming a public officer, and, most of all, the highest officer under the Republic. It was the duty of the committee, having entered upon the investigation, to prove the truth or the falsity of these charges. If the allegations with regard to the "Dick-to-Dick" letter were not true, then there was nothing to the entire fabric of charges, except possibly the fact that the President or some other public official had not been sufficiently careful in fully investigating the proposed eliminations and in determining its effect upon the public. We urged these matters at length before the committee. The arguments did not go into the RECORD, because the reporter, for some reason unknown to me, departed from the table at the time the argument was taken up. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] Later the committee met while the House was in session, not that the committee has any authority to meet, but the minority Members are anxious to have the work of the committee expedited, and have not objected to the meeting of the committee during the sessions of the House. The meeting was held in the room of the Committee on Ways and Means while the House was in session. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] presented the resolution to which he has referred, reciting the history of this matter, calling attention to its importance, and demanding that the committee proceed with the investigation immediately. Forthwith the motion was declared out of order, and in less time than it takes to tell it, we discovered that we were in executive session. What occurred there I do not think it would be entirely proper for me to disclose. But the matter stands right there, with a motion on the part of the minority to continue the investigation declared by the chairman to be out of order, and, therefore, no vote taken.

Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the committee has suggested that it would not be proper or advisable to continue this investigation at this time for various reasons. First, he says we have not the papers on which to continue or to pursue the investigation at this time. That has been answered by both the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], to the effect that the question as to the truth or falsity of the charges relative to the so-called Dick-to-Dick letter is not a matter of record but a matter of testimony, and all those who could by any possibility have any knowledge of the existence of that document, if there ever was any such document, were before the committee or could have been brought before the committee in 15 minutes. [Applause on the Republican side.] Yet that question was not gone into—the important and controlling question before the committee for investigation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, had it been necessary to secure all the documents, they were procurable. The only reason why they have not been generally promulgated is that there were a number of maps accompanying them, and it has not been possible for the Printing Office to get out those maps, but the Senate document, with copies of all of the papers referred to, of everything on the files referring to this matter, has been available to the committee for some time. The original documents are available to the committee at any time, and even if that were not true all of the important facts relative to the truth or falsity of the charges made could be proven or disproven by witnesses who are easily available. Yet the committee has refused to call the witnesses. It has refused to even consider the demand of the minority that these witnesses should be examined and that the matter should be pursued to a conclusion. The chairman suggests that the request of the Secretary of the Interior that we continue the investigation was not founded on matters of sufficient importance, because he said that if there were a question as to the improper conduct of the officers of the Department of the Interior that was a matter they should investigate and over which we had no jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker, that very question has been discussed time and time again before the committee, and the chairman has constantly held, as have other members of the committee, that we have jurisdiction over such matters, and we are at this time, or were up to within a few days ago, investigating just such a matter—the conduct of officials in the Interior Department, and our honored chairman has insisted that that is the first and highest and most important duty of the committee. Yet when it comes to a question of so grave a character that it involves the President of the United States, evidently the gentlemen do not consider the rule which they have themselves invoked a good one, and decline to continue an investigation which is demanded in justice to the people of the country and to the honored head of the Nation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The chairman has stated certain alleged reasons for not continuing the investigation at this time, or rather when it was first taken up. These reasons may seem sufficient to him, but it occurs to me that they will scarcely be convincing in view of the fact that a further investigation would definitely establish what is already known, that such a thing as the "Dick-to-Dick" postscript never existed and that the claim that it did was a wicked and malicious falsehood; and in view of the further fact that a thorough investigation would establish what is already patent, that the action taken by the President in eliminating lands from the reserve was necessary in order to afford competition in transportation of the Bering River coal when that coal shall become available for shipment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will inquire of the gentleman from Illinois, if he intends to use all of the balance of his time himself?

Mr. GRAHAM. No; I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the only trouble with the minority side of this House is a case of the tail trying to wag the dog. Three members of this committee come in here and make vigorous, unheard-of complaints, objecting solely and alone to the policy of the majority of the committee. Well, I am one humble member of the majority of that committee, and I will say that I believe that as long as I am a member of the majority I shall cast one vote in allowing the majority to run that committee as they see fit. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It has been charged here that the committee has indulged in dilatory tactics. That charge is not well founded. That committee has perhaps seen more active service since this special session began than any other committee save and except the Ways and Means Committee alone. It is true that the gentlemen on the minority side of this committee are not pleased with it. Mr. Speaker, we did not expect them to be pleased with it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] For 16 long years they have had control of this Government from A to Z, and their books need auditing, and they need investigating, and your committee will do the business if you stick by them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] A hit dog generally howls, and they are howling. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Last year we came in here with an investigating resolution in regard to the Ballinger-Pinchot matter and the gentlemen on that side of the House said that muckraking was running wild. The resolution was passed, the investigation was held, and Richard Ballinger is not Secretary of the Interior to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This committee is trying to do its duty, trying to save for the 90,000,000 of people of this Republic what justly belongs to them from the hands of plunderers, and if you come in and allow the tail to wag the dog, the dog that is hit probably will not howl any longer because he will not be hit. The four members of the majority on this committee are going to investigate this matter with due haste——

Mr. MANN. "Due haste" is good.

Mr. FERRIS. They meet every other day now; we had a meeting to-day. The gentlemen lay great stress on the fact that the matter stands on a motion of theirs to go on with the investigation. Gentlemen, to my mind there is nothing deplorable about that. I have no objection to the minority trying to have us adopt their view, but I do not believe the majority Members of this House can have any objection or find any fault with us for doing what we think is our duty. Now, some Member on that side, the gentleman from Washington, I believe, has elected to use terms of vituperation against certain witnesses and their testimony. I want to make one observation right along that line. I ask you Members of the minority who represents Alaska, a Republican or a Democrat?

SEVERAL MEMBERS (on the Republican side). Give it up.

Mr. FERRIS. He is a Republican. You may disown him, but he sits on your side of the House. I ask you where is Delegate WICKERSHAM? Why is he not here complaining of the action of this committee? He sits on your side of the House; he is one of the prime movers in this investigation; disown him if you can, disown him if you dare, but he is your own kind. The real trouble is he is here trying to tell the truth about you, as I believe the information will disclose. No fair-minded man will say that Alaska is not a Republican Territory, and has been represented by a Republican ever since I have been here. I guess there never has been a Democratic Delegate, although I am not sure about that; but, at least, the last two were Republicans and the present one is a Republican, and he is one of the prime movers in the investigation of you very fellows who are now complaining. I did not intend to say a word, but I ask the majority Members of this House to stand by the committee, which is trying to do its duty, and not to allow the tail to wag the dog. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Illinois intend to conclude in one speech?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 10 minutes, 1 minute which the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] did not use.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Oklahoma says they are the dog [laughter], and I am willing to admit it. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] said that the Delegate from Alaska should have been heard. Why did you not put him on the stand when he was there to testify?

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman want me to answer?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] has not graced the city with his presence during these investigations. He tells us now that he stands pat. He has not been within a thousand miles of the investigation. When the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. WICKERSHAM] was before the committee, when Miss Abbott was before the committee, when Brown was before the committee, ready to testify, why were they not called upon to testify? Nobody has complained because the committee has not reported without due investigation; but to postpone investigation, to put off witnesses who are there ready to testify, is not in the interests of decent government. It is a scandal in the House. [Applause on the Republican side.] The only excuse that could be given would be the manly excuse that they got hold of the hot end of the poker and wanted to let go. [Applause on the Republican side.]

If the committee had had the manliness to say, "We have brought out what appeared to be a scandal against the President, we have learned it is a lie, and we do not wish to go further," the American people would have paid tribute to their honesty of purpose. [Applause on the Republican side.] But when they bring out what appears to be scandal, and then refuse to go ahead with it, they have put themselves down as cowards. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I notice in the hearings that one Mr. W. P. Fennell, an attorney at law, appears on behalf of the committee, and the newspapers and the newspaper correspondents inform you and me that the committee has engaged, and that the chairman of the committee has so stated, one Brandeis to appear as attorney for the committee. By what authority? Who is paying Mr. Fennell? Who is behind the scandal? The committee has no authority to employ an attorney. Does the gentleman claim that the committee has authority to employ one? Or is Mr. Fennell employed as clerk of the committee? The committee had authority to employ a clerk, and perhaps the committee, knowing its own limitations, when it employs a clerk at $125 a month has the clerk appear to instruct the committee what to do. And at that they would be wise, because no one could know less how to do than the majority of the committee have shown they have known. [Applause on the Republican side.] Who is paying for these attorneys? Let us know who is behind the game.

The gentlemen say that we are complaining about the investigation. Not at all. We are complaining about the lack of investigation. We are urging the investigation; we are willing for you to investigate our books and our acts during the entire Republican administrations of, lo, these many years. [Applause on the Republican side.] But we want you to do it, and not make threats and stop. We want you to investigate, and we hope that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], a Member of this House, will stay in Washington and attend to his duties as a member of the investigating committee, instead of going home and then coming back and talking big.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman think that since the President has used the prerogative of voice so freely, that that ought to offset any committee, and that he would have this House believe that that did away with anything that we might do or say?

Mr. MANN. The President, in response to a resolution of the Senate, brought about in part by the same animus that animates a majority of the committee, sent a response to the resolution giving such facts as he had. I have some interest in this matter myself. In the last Congress we passed the bill granting a right to a railroad to go to deep water at Controller Bay. That bill went through my committee and went through my hands. It was at first suggested that that was a part of the conspiracy. I want to see who makes that charge. [Applause on the Republican side.] I want to know who on the Democratic side or elsewhere says that my committee or myself was actuated by any improper motives when we reported a bill which became a law that no one can find fault with. [Applause on the Republican side.] Turn on the light! We want you to turn it on. We are not asking that we have the power of investigation; we are demanding that you, who talk big, make good by your investigation, and act now, if you are men; but if you are cowards, quit! [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] has 15 minutes left.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker [applause on the Democratic side], the course which the debate has taken on the other side of the Chamber places me in a rather embarrassing position. As the chairman of that committee, my sense of the proprieties convinces me that my words should be spoken in moderation. The position I occupy is at least quasi judicial, and I can not decently or with propriety answer the remarks of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] and the remarks of some of the other gentlemen who have spoken on that side of the House in the spirit in which they were made, much as I would like to do so. I am precluded from resorting to the language of vituperation and from following their example by attempting to exhaust all the superlatives in the dictionary. I will not so far forget my duty to this House and to myself as to do that. Gentlemen on the other side may try to provoke me to do it, but they will not succeed. I have been placed in that situation too often to be thus provoked here. When I was a good deal younger than I am now I was often provoked into a quarrel by being called a coward, but I have long since learned that the man who calls another a coward is himself more likely to deserve the appellation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Such language is cowardly language to use [renewed applause on the Democratic side], and is the strongest indication of a weak cause.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Washington admits that the resolution he prepared and offered is defective. Of course he could not say otherwise when its defects are pointed out. He says that he copied it from a House resolution offered and passed by the majority, and that he was thus misled. Of course it would not be fair for me to expect a very great deal of intelligence from gentlemen on the other side of the House, but I did think that the gentlemen would know there was a difference between the powers of a committee acting under the rules of this House and a committee that was acting under a special resolution. But the gentleman from Washington seemed not to be able to make that distinction, and probably does not see the difference yet.

He said further that the Pacific coast is intensely interested in this Alaskan question. I concede it. I concede that they are so interested in it that a great many of them are anxious to see that marvelous territory exploited for the benefit of a syndicate in the hope that they may get some of the drippings. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But our committee will not help them in that regard. Our committee regards Alaska as an asset of the American people, bought and paid for with the money of the American people, and that the tremendous, the untold, the almost inconceivable wealth of that Territory belongs to-day to the American people. It stands in a class of its own. I never expect to see—and I doubt if anyone will—the time when the native white population of Alaska will be in any degree commensurate with the illimitable wealth that there is in that Territory, and I say that that excess of wealth belongs to the people of the United States, and that it would be short-sighted and very foolish indeed, even at the behest of the gentleman from Washington or his people on the Pacific coast, to permit that enormous wealth to fall into the hands of great syndicates, to use it to the detriment of the people of this country.

The majority members of the committee do not favor such a policy as that, and when the minority try in this case to change the issue and make it appear that a certain "Dick-to-

Dick" letter and an alleged attack on the President are the issues here, I answer they are wrong and they know it. These are not the issues; they are mere side issues. Gentlemen rush to the defense of the President when no one has attacked him. This committee has never said a disrespectful word of the President, nor shall it, if the chairman can control its action. The committee and the chairman respect the office and the man who holds it, and they are particularly careful to make no assault of any character on the President or on that great office whoever may be in it; so that in trying to assume here that the President had been assailed and that they are rushing to his defense, gentlemen are simply trying to switch the issue from the real issue to a feigned one and thus to cover up somebody's tracks.

Speaking for myself, I am exceedingly suspicious—I hardly know what word to use to express exactly my idea—but I am doubtful, to say the least of it, about matters pertaining to Alaska. I have been through that mill once. It was but a little more than a year ago that the President of the United States sacrificed a young man of sterling character, of unblemished integrity, and of the highest patriotism, a man who saved to the people by his courage property of enormous value, property that the present Secretary of the Interior has since declared was about to be fraudulently taken from the people and given to a great syndicate.

If the President makes one mistake, as he did in the sacrifice of the young man Glavis, I am not sure but that he might make another mistake. That young man was sacrificed because he pointed out the tracks that were being made by those who would steal the illimitable wealth of the Territory of Alaska. Was that a crime? If, in the estimation of the administration, it was not, why was this young man punished? And if, when he was punished, the administration honestly believed he was in error, then, when they found he was not in error, why was no apology or explanation made? Why was no restitution made? Why is that young man still suffering as a victim for trying to serve his country and his fellow citizens?

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been said that witnesses were before our committee, and that the committee would not or did not hear them. But the committee was hearing witnesses right along. Did you ever know of a case, either in court or committee, where two witnesses testified at one time? And when the gentlemen named—Brown and Carr and Ryan and Wickersham—were in the committee room waiting, other witnesses were giving testimony. The policy of the committee and the judgment of its chairman was that the way to produce the evidence in this case was to lay out the ground, to get in the record a complete description of the physical conditions existing in Alaska. Think of it. I appeal to my colleagues on the Republican side of the House, and particularly to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON], who is before me as one who knows many of the facts.

In the testimony before the Ballinger committee it appeared that the Bering coal fields are within 25 miles of Controller Bay, which has virtually been given to Mr. Ryan. At that time the testimony was that there were 500,000,000 tons of coal altogether in that field. Yet a few days ago, before our committee, Mr. Brooks, the coal expert of the Geological Survey, testified that instead of 500,000,000 tons, later investigation has shown that there are at least 1,500,000,000 tons, and that there are probably 3,000,000,000 tons of coal in that field, and that if there is ever any change to be made in the figures he says, it will be to increase them rather than to diminish them. [Applause.]

And he further says, under oath, that what is true of the Bering coal field in that regard is true of every mineral deposit in Alaska. Is it any wonder, then, that those who favor the policy of giving Alaska to the syndicates, as suggested by some gentlemen here, are interested in exploiting this marvelous territory? The chairman of the committee believes, and the majority of the committee are in harmony with him in that regard, that it is not a question of the Dick-to-Dick letter, that it is not a question of vindicating the President against aspersions, or, at least, that it is not these matters alone, but that the main question—the great issue—is, What shall the American people do with the Territory of Alaska? [Applause.]

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GRAHAM. No; he was never in Alaska. What does he know about Alaska? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GRAHAM. If it was a question about Pennsylvania, Mr. Speaker, I would yield to him. I would expect him to tell us something about conditions there—about the enormous mineral wealth of Pennsylvania that was appropriated years ago and that has passed into the hands of syndicates of one sort and another, resulting in more wretchedness and destitution in the great cities of Pennsylvania to-day than can be found anywhere else in this Union. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I would prevent that. The majority of the committee would prevent that, and they would save these enormous deposits of Alaska from the syndicates and for the benefit of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Dakota now exhibits a copy of the Senate document in question, and says that a copy of it could have been had at any time, and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] says the only reason why this Senate document has not been generally promulgated is that they were waiting for certain maps to be inserted. What does he mean by "generally" circulated? Does it mean that the minority Members could have them, but the majority Members could not? The Senate document which the gentleman from South Dakota now exhibits contains 408 pages of printed matter, all of it, no doubt, being correspondence, letters, and documents concerning this Controller Bay matter. The letter which I have read from the Secretary of the Senate, and my inability to get any word from the printer expert is, I think, a complete answer to the claim of gentlemen that we might have had it, while the statements and the letter of Secretary Fisher which I have read, sufficiently show the necessity for having it.

No fairly intelligent examination of witnesses could be had without it. The gentleman from South Dakota and the gentleman from Wyoming must have known that, and while they had the use of it, as they now admit, and knew the majority Members did not have it, they were insisting on pushing the examination with vigor.

I will not say that gentlemen on the committee do not desire a thorough investigation of this matter, but I do say that if that was their purpose they could not pursue a course better calculated to bring it about.

Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to discuss the subject matter of the Controller Bay situation at all at this time, but gentlemen have made it almost necessary that I say something about it.

This bay is a land-locked harbor near the mouth of the Bering River and about 25 miles from the famous Bering coal field, which is now estimated by the Geological Survey Service to contain about 3,000,000,000 tons of coal, half of it anthracite and half bituminous.

This harbor is easily accessible to the open sea and has an excellent channel for ingress and egress.

A short time before the expiration of his term President Roosevelt enlarged the boundaries of the Chugach National Forest, so that it included the shore commanding Controller Bay.

This prevented anyone from getting title to the shore for any purpose whatever, and if undisturbed would have kept the harbor under control of the Government. On October 28, 1910, President Taft, by an Executive order, eliminated 12,800 acres of land from this national forest, thus throwing it open to be located on by any citizen. On November 1—that is, on the fourth day after the signing of the Executive order—a location was filed at the Juneau land office covering one-half mile of the Controller Bay shore line, and soon afterwards three other locations of a half mile each were made on the shore of the bay. These four locations, with the three intervening strips of 80 rods each, which remain in the Government under the law, comprise the shore line opposite the harbor.

Between the shore line and the harbor are tide flats extending 2 or 3 miles. These four locations were made in the interest of Mr. R. S. Ryan, who appears to be intimately connected with the Alaska Pacific Railway and Terminal Co.

Permission has been given this company by the War Department to build across these tide flats to the deep water, and then to erect wharves and other structures for a distance of about one-third of a mile along the most available part of the harbor, and it appears this permission has been acted upon at least in part.

There is usually in Executive orders of this character a provision that 30 or 60 days' notice must be given before any locations can be made on the land affected.

When the order in question first appeared in the Interior Department it had such a provision in it, but when promulgated it did not have any provision for notice.

As there has been no public survey of land in that part of Alaska—indeed, with the exception of a few townships, none in any part of Alaska—those desiring to make locations must first have the land surveyed by a competent surveyor, and the notes and descriptions of the survey must be filed in the land office at Juneau, a considerable distance away, with no railroad connection. In the absence of such provision for notice of the opening of the land to entry it is apparent that anyone knowing it was about to be opened would have a great advantage over all others.

Locations on unsurveyed land such as this was can be made only on what is called "soldiers' additional scrip," and such location is not subject to attack if the scrip is authentic, so that if the scrip was valid the locator would have an absolute fee-simple title. Soldiers' additional scrip was used in making these locations. This brief statement of some of the facts suggests many inquiries.

Why was the elimination made at all? Why was the usual provision for publication of notice stricken out? How did Mr. Ryan know of the order in advance? How did he have the survey of this quarter section made so quickly in a country which had no fixed monuments or starting places and get the result of this survey to Juneau, a distance of several hundred miles, with no railroad communication, all in three or four days?

The majority of the committee have no ax to grind, no one to punish, and no one to defend. They are only anxious to develop the facts, and are willing to follow the facts wherever they lead, and they simply ask to be allowed to do that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONSERVATION OF OUR NATURAL RESOURCES.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an address delivered by Henry Sturgis Drinker, LL. D., president of Lehigh University, at the exercises commemorating the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Michigan College of Mines, at Houghton, Mich., on "The contribution of the mining profession to the conservation of our natural resources." Dr. Drinker is not only a mining engineer of note, but also the head of one of the most important and certainly one of the most practical of all our educational institutions, and his address will be of particular interest at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the address to which he has referred. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE CONTRIBUTION OF THE MINING PROFESSION TO THE CONSERVATION OF OUR NATURAL RESOURCES.

An address delivered by Henry Sturgis Drinker, LL. D., president of Lehigh University, at the exercises commemorating the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Michigan College of Mines, Houghton, Mich., August 8 to 11, 1911.

This is a great mining school, and at this gathering of its clans it may be well for us, as mining engineers, to take account of stock, so to speak—to review and summarize to some extent what the profession of mining engineering has done in the last generation for the benefit and advancement of the material interests of our country—for the conservation of the natural resources of the country.

The early reports, successively, of J. Ross Browne and of Rossiter W. Raymond as United States commissioners of mining statistics threw great light on the previously obscure and the then almost fabulous subject of the mineral resources of the country. In Dr. Raymond's report of January, 1869, to the Secretary of the Treasury, on "The present condition and prospects of the mining industry" (The Mines of the West, chapter on mining education, p. 224) we find an enlightening and prophetic statement of the value of some system of mining education to be carried on in this country, in which the graduates are to practice rather than that they should be compelled to seek for such information in the French and German technical schools. Dr. Raymond, in this article, foreshadowed in 1869, over 40 years ago, the lesson of economy in the development of our mining resources, where he speaks of "the protection of the country against reckless and wasteful mining by the inculcation of sound principles and the enlightenment of the miners as to their best interests." It is a fact not generally known or appreciated that this matter of the need of conservation of our natural resources, particularly of our mining and timber resources, to which the general public is only just awakening, has been the subject of careful study and outspoken warning by our engineers for years, and there is no body of men who have contributed more valuable knowledge and suggestion in this matter than the American Institute of Mining Engineers, founded in May, 1871. This society of engineers has done incalculable good in the last 40 years in developing technical knowledge, research, and discussion by its meetings and publications, and in its history the institute, beginning with the notable discussions on "Waste in coal mining" and on "Technical education," in the early seventies, up through the succeeding years, has taken leadership in the consideration and study of many important matters pertaining directly to conservation and engineering education.

Mr. John Birkinbine, past president of the institute, well commented on this in a paper read at the New Haven meeting of the institute in February, 1909, when he said:

"Anticipating that the sudden awakening of popular interest in conservation may be short lived unless an appreciation of utilization is associated with it, I hope that this interesting and important problem will be treated, not as a new cult, but as a practical development for which able men have labored conscientiously, persistently, and not unsuccessfully, for many years. The members of the institute are especially bound to claim for many illustrious men among its members who have passed away, as well as many who are now living, the credit due for devoted, disinterested, and most effective, though not theatrical and sensational work, which accomplished more in real results of national economy than any vague, indiscriminate, and undirected popular enthusiasm or any crude and hasty legislation, however patriotic in spirit and purpose, could reasonably be expected to effect."

At the first meeting of the institute, held at Wilkes-Barre in May, 1871, at which, as a young engineer, I had the privilege of being present, a committee was appointed "to consider and report on the waste in coal mining," following the presentation of a thoughtful paper on the subject by an eminent engineer, the late Richard P. Rothwell, and the discussions thereon; and it should be noted that even at this early period the waste resulting from mining under short-term leases was referred to, Mr. Rothwell saying:

"The system of leases under which the operator pays for coal shipped, but not for coal wasted, and for the larger sizes frequently a larger royalty than for the smaller sizes, greatly aggravates the evil. When the leases are, moreover, for short periods the combination of conditions is most mischievous. It then makes no difference to the lessee how much coal is wasted or left in the ground. His efforts are directed to getting to market as much coal of the most salable sizes in the given time."

And this same point was emphasized in a paper read by J. W. Harden at the Boston meeting of the institute in February, 1873, when he said:

"It has been said that lessees have not the opportunity of making the best of the mine for themselves or the owner, owing to the short period over which their tenure frequently extends; this should be remedied; every facility consistent with the proper working of the mine should be given, nothing reasonable withheld, as on the lessee rests the greatest share of contingencies and risk."

The above committee on waste in coal mining presented a preliminary report at the second meeting of the institute, held at Bethlehem, Pa., in August, 1871, in which valuable recommendations were made. It was found, however, as time went on that this work, started by the institute committee, required the authority and backing of the State for its successful prosecution, and largely through the efforts of the late Eckley B. Coxe, one of the most distinguished and able mining engineers our country has ever known, the Legislature of Pennsylvania passed, in 1889, an act creating a coal-waste commission. Mr. Coxe, who had been from the first chairman of the institute committee on coal waste, was made a member of this commission and became its chairman, and the commission made a valuable and exhaustive report in May, 1893. In this report the commission, in discussing methods of mining, made this wise comment:

"It is one of the best evidences of engineering skill when the coal that must be sacrificed is determined and deliberately set apart for that purpose at the time the colliery is opened out, or very soon thereafter."

And in commenting on "avoidable waste by mining," they said:

"When any given territory is to be worked a much larger percentage of coal can be gotten out if the conditions in which the coal occurs are carefully studied and a general system of working decided upon and thoroughly carried out from the beginning."

How obvious it is that these wise suggestions can only be carried out when the mining operations are conducted on a large scale, with ample capital, under conditions of actual ownership or under leases of such long term as will financially justify such a plan of working, and that they would be impracticable where mining is to be pursued in small operations with limited capital where speedy returns must be exacted on the capital invested.

In all the discussions that have been had on these matters I know of none where the subject matter considered was more important, or the papers were more valuable, than the proceedings at the notable joint meeting held in New York, March 24, 1909, of the four great engineering societies—the American Society of Civil Engineers, the American Institute of Mining Engineers, the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, and the American Institute of Electrical Engineers—to consider the matter of the conservation of our natural resources. Dr. Raymond's admirable and exhaustive paper at that meeting on "Conservation by legislation," and dealing among other subjects with the conservation of coal, was later followed by the paper on "The conservation of coal in the United States," of Mr. Edw. W. Parker, statistician in charge of the Division of Mineral Resources of the United States Geological Survey, read at the Spokane meeting of the Institute of Mining Engineers in September, 1909. In view of the rather superficial utterances that have been put forth during the last year or so on the general conservation question, it would seem to be the duty of engineers to keep in touch with this matter, and to do their share toward shaping the policy of the Nation to a course based on reason and technical knowledge rather than on sentimental diatribe. I think that a greater danger to-day to the public interests is threatened by the untrained, spasmodic, semipolitical, and careless presentation and handling of these matters before the public by men on whom their importance has suddenly dawned than even by a continuance of the wasteful methods of the past. We all know how the panic-stricken householder will often destroy property in the effort to save it in a fire, when the trained firemen, by more effective and intelligent work, save with less danger and surer results. It is so easy to say in a general way that "we must not waste our natural resources; that we must be prudent and not recklessly blind in handling them; that they must not be monopolized by the few; and that the present generation, while using what it needs, must recognize its obligation to our descendants," but surely all this is too general to be of practical value—"vox et praeterea nihil!"—unless it is followed by expert advice and intelligent action.

Col. Roosevelt has justly been given the credit of directing immediate public attention to these matters, but, granting the danger of waste, or of unwise disposition of these resources, to which the statesman may wisely awaken the Nation, it becomes the province of the engineering expert rather than of the publicist to point out the remedy.

It is dangerous for a man untrained in engineering to venture opinions on questions like the conservation of coal and the development of water powers, which require the judgment and experience of engineers. The trouble with many of the plans for coal and water-power conservation proposed by men untrained and inexperienced in engineering and in business methods is that their plans are ideal rather than real, their dicta negative rather than positive, and their remedies theoretical rather than practical. You have doubtless observed that the fear that is uppermost with such men is often rather that our public resources will pass into the control of what they term the "monopolistic interests of the few," than the crucial question of what is the best plan or system for the economic winning of our natural resources in the interest of the public. What engineers should urge and impress upon the public mind is the importance of looking at these industrial questions in a wholly cold-blooded, business way, without any obsession or oppression of undefined hysterical fear of the results or dangers of a so-called corporate monopoly that are often as visionary as the nursery tales of bogies to frighten children into being good. Corporations, as we know, are, as a rule, only aggregations of capital to promote some useful industrial or transportation purpose; they are, like other agencies of the day, capable of use and of abuse. Strychnine is a virulent poison used ignorantly or for an evil purpose, but it is a valuable medicinal remedy in the hands of the physician; and under the recent broad decision of the Supreme Court the reasonable function of the large corporation has been defined. Attorney General Wickersham in his recent address across the bridge at Hancock, in this State, summarized this in a few pointed words when he said (in reference to the Sherman Act):

"But when the Supreme Court said we must read this statute as reasonable men and give it an interpretation that will not strangle all trade, but which will prevent any undue restraint, prohibit all contracts and combinations that are intended to interfere with the natural course of trade, then the court gave us a means of preventing those evils which led to the enactment of the law."

And in his recent luminous address delivered July 19 last at Duluth, before the Minnesota State Bar Association, on "What further regulation of interstate commerce is necessary or desirable," Mr. Wickersham said:

"Fair competition is essential to healthy national life, but it is more than doubtful whether or not there can be fair competition without concert of action or cooperative effort to some extent. Business men of integrity are naturally desirous of avoiding violations of law. The construction of the Sherman law originally contended for would have condemned them for any concerted action which imposed any restraint on trade. The more enlightened view which has been expressed by the Supreme Court limits the prohibition to undue restraints, those which are not the result of normal business methods, but which are intended to accomplish or have for their direct and primary purpose interference with the natural course of trade and commerce among the States or with foreign countries. Yet even within these rules there is an area of activity where cooperation and association should only have play under Government supervision and control."

In taking wise and broad measures to avail best of our undeveloped natural resources, the need is not so much to withdraw and set them aside for the use of future generations as to be sure that they are not wasted in their use by the present generation. Let our natural resources be utilized following the natural laws of supply and demand, with due regard to the essential factor that private capital will never venture into the proper, broad, economic exploitation of these resources without the assurance of a sufficiently permanent tenure to insure an adequate return. And let us give due recognition to the thought that conservation may be overdone by the undue and unwise stimulation of such popular demand for drastic control that we may dwarf the business development of our present and coming generations by conserving resources now urgently needed, especially in Alaska and in the West, only to set them aside for the needs of an indefinite future, when other agencies may have been found to take their place. Do not let us be blinded or misled by the fears of the uninformed or, by what is equally dangerous, the narrow view of the partially informed, who fear industrial dangers they have never actually faced, and preach a crusade against evils that are so theoretic that practical men know them to be imaginary.

The difficulty, and the probable error, in criticising all large development enterprises as being so-called monopolies is that the superficial critic is apt to consider and discuss the situation on one side only. The conservation—the careful mining—of our coal, and the economic development of our latent water powers, for instance, can only be managed properly by the investment of large capital, and this can today be supplied only by the association of many individuals having capital to invest, into large corporations controlling such aggregate capital, or by the Utopian plan of State or Federal ownership and the use of the public funds in an industrial enterprise. As to corporations, the stronger they are the more surely are they in a position to handle the mining problem conservatively and economically. The economic mining of coal—the proper development of a water-power site, involve purely expert question, but it takes capital to command the best expert talent. The paper by Mr. Edw. W. Parker, statistician in charge of the Division of Mineral Resources of the United States Geological Survey, above referred to, on "The conservation of coal in the United States," contains wise references to the conservation benefit to the country resulting from the control of the anthracite interests passing into strong financial hands. He says:

"Most of the members of the institute are cognizant of the suits brought by the Government against the anthracite operators in Pennsylvania, or the combination of interests commonly known as the 'Hard Coal Trust.' No defense of any illegal combination in restraint of trade is intended, but there are some facts which should not be lost sight of, and unfortunately those whose opinions are based upon the 'news' given to us by the daily press are likely to be governed by ex parte testimony. The present situation in the anthracite region is one that has been developed through sheer necessity, if the conservation of the supply of anthracite and the prolongation of the life of the fields in the best interests of the people were to be attained in any other way than through Government control, and Government control did not seem to be materializing. I believe that even Dr. Raymond will subscribe to the statement that a good part of the history of anthracite mining has been one of profligate waste in the mining, preparation, and use of that precious supply of fuel; and this has only been remedied none too soon, and could, under the circumstances, only be remedied by the close control and conservative management which have been brought about in recent years. And I might pause here to pay a merited tribute to such men as Dr. Raymond, Eckley B. Coxe, P. W. Sheafer, Franklin B. Gowen, William Griffith, and a few others through whose efforts many reforms which lessened the waste of anthracite were effected. They were the pioneers in the battle for conservation, and a monument should be erected to them.

"The securing by the Reading Railroad for its offspring, the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., of the great coal reserves it owns to-day, was the beginning of a great movement which was foreseen by those in a position to see. The Reading Co. was temporarily bankrupted through its guarantee of the debt thus incurred, but the possession and control of those coal lands are indirectly the most valuable assets of the railroad at the present time. More than this, however, in the ultimate economy of things, has been the preservation of thousands of acres of coal lands from reckless spoliation. The way was paved for the safe and sane control of the anthracite industry, albeit by a trust, and a stop was put to the cut-throat competition and extravagant methods which in earlier years had resulted in losses of millions of dollars in money and more than millions of tons of coal.

"Under former conditions in the anthracite regions, when it was not considered necessary to give thought to the morrow, and indeed up to the time when the Anthracite Coal Waste Commission made its report, it was estimated that for every ton of coal mined and sold 1.5 tons were lost. The greater part of this loss was in the coal left in the ground as pillars to protect the workings, while millions of tons of small coal or screenings were thrown on the culm banks which now form unsightly mountains in the coal regions. Improved methods of mining and of preparation have of late years reduced the percentage of waste, so that at present the recovery will average about 60 per cent and the loss about 40 per cent. * * * A careful study of conditions in the anthracite region will convince the most skeptical that no robbery of the public is now being carried on."

Dr. Raymond, in his discussion of the question of corporation control of our coal interests, in the course of his paper (above referred to) on "Conservation by legislation," said:

"I remember well what Eckley B. Coxe said to me, that salvation for the anthracite region, and its store of natural resources, lay in the control of the collieries by capitalists who had other aims than immediate profit from the coal; and that the acquisition of such control by great railway companies, whose interest it was to make anthracite the basis of a profitable freight business for generations to come, was not only the best but the only remedy for the reckless and the irreparable waste which the system of 'hogging' the mines under short leases had brought about."

Dr. Raymond further added (speaking of Mr. Coxe's prediction): "The results verified his prophecy. The great railway companies operating the anthracite collieries have put more money into preliminary dead work and costly machinery; have been the pioneers of rational forestry for the provision of permanent supplies of mining timber; have enforced economy in every department of production; have trained and employed the most skillful engineers and experts; in short, have redeemed from immediately impending rack and ruin the whole anthracite industry."

The question—the practical question—is, how is the public to-day—how are our future generations, to be best benefited by conservation? It would be nonsensical to say that we do not wish our coal, or our water powers, to be leased to, or availed of, for the present generation, simply because we wish to preserve them for future generations.

In the Advance Chapter from the Mineral Resources of the United States, published this year, by the United States Geological Survey, on "The production of coal in 1909," there is an able note on the serious handicap to the development of the coal industry in Alaska by the existing coal-land laws, showing that the law and practice are so absolutely impracticable that up to July, 1910, not a single acre of land had gone to patent. This is prohibition of all development, not sane conservation, and this note shows that evidently the difficulty lies in the fact that the law is in such shape as to be absolutely antagonistic to the investment of capital in such quantity as to permit profitable mining, the purpose of the present law being to prevent the monopolization of coal fields—its actual and immediate effect being to wholly discourage capital.

In the report of the National Conservation Commission, made through President Roosevelt to Congress in January, 1909, Mr. J. A. Holmes (now Director of the United States Bureau of Mines), in reporting on our mineral resources, said:

"In considering the conservation of resources it should be held in mind that—

"(1) The present generation has the power and the right to use efficiently so much of these resources as it needs.

"(2) The Nation's needs will not be curtailed; these needs will increase with the extent and diversity of its industries, and more rapidly than its population.

"(3) The men of this generation will not mine, extract, or use these resources in such manner as to entail continuous financial loss to themselves in order that something be left for the future. There will be no mineral industry without profits."

With regard to what may happen in the distant future when our coal supply is exhausted, Dr. Robert Thomas Moore, in his presidential address at London, before the Institution of Mining Engineers, of England, said in May, 1909:

"Whether, indeed, it is a profitable matter to attempt to imagine the State of Britain 300 years after this, with its coal exhausted, or a world, say, 200 years later, when it is all finished, is open to question. It is certainly beyond the scope or the objects of the institution.

"I do not think it commends itself as an economic principle to restrict in any way the legitimate development of our mineral resources. They are a source of wealth to ourselves, and we are helping to develop the world. Is it not more reasonable to trust to the progress of science to discover some fresh method of utilizing the resources of nature to provide a substitute? Who would have expected, even 30 years ago, the immense possibilities for distributing light and heat and power that the development of electricity has opened up? We have the forces of the rainfall, the wind, and the tides to utilize to the utmost. We may even get our heat and power direct from the sun.

"Those who come after us have a long time in which to consider the problem, and we may safely leave it to them to solve in their own way.

"But that of which we should be careful is that we should use our coal in the best possible manner—that in the working of it and in the using of it there should be no waste, either of men, of material, or of treasure; and it is the duty of an institution such as ours to afford every aid to the presentation of any plan which will further the attainment of these objects."

The question is whether the present generation needs these resources; if it needs them, the need is exactly that which would be supplied were they held for succeeding generations. It seems to me that the main thing to be guarded against is that the natural resources still in the ownership and possession of the National Government shall not be so disposed of that they can be acquired at a comparatively low price now, to be held wholly speculatively, for development in an indefinite future; surely this can easily be guarded, because there are few corporations who can command large sums of money to be locked up for a return a century hence. Stockholders want a quicker return for their money.

But, again, how easily this principle can be distorted or misapplied by an honest but narrow and inexperienced enthusiast; for any large enterprise must be enabled to acquire a sufficiently large body of coal, or a sufficiently long lease of water power, to at least secure a sinking-fund return on capital subscribed or borrowed. Proper conservation of our natural resources does not mean throwing open their exploitation to the wasteful methods and inexperienced handling of individual operators with the unnecessary duplication of plants and the waste of capital involved in uneconomic individual operation. Conservation of our natural resources does not mean the conservation of the individual operator. As a rule, it points to reasonable cooperative effort lawfully exercised in the interest of that economy in methods resulting from operating on the larger scale that conserves our resources for the benefit of the consumer and prevents their waste by the producer. Much of the twaddle that is talked and written arises from a sentimental sympathy for the individual operator, who is often the worst enemy of true conservation. As a rule, there is no more wasteful system of mining than that pursued by the small individual operator. The man who owns or leases a small mine, or who leases a large mine for a limited period on limited capital, is almost certain to mine extravagantly. He absolutely must get all he can out of it in the cheapest way possible. He is not concerned with laying out deadwork ahead—with planning far in advance so as to take out the largest possible amount of coal or mineral in the most economical way. He has the power, within certain bounds, as a rule, under his lease, to so operate as to get the largest amount out of the mine in the cheapest and quickest way possible, practically regardless of the waste in mining. Moreover, the small individual operator is, as a rule, absolutely indifferent to the interests of the public, whereas a large corporation, doing business not for a limited term, but for time, must so conduct its business as to be content with a moderate and reasonable profit on a product mined economically, and with a far-seeing eye to the conservation and avail of all its resources and to the just treatment of its customers.

These suggestions as to the individual operator apply equally to small corporations not possessing sufficient capital and strength to mine economically and with an eye to the future.

In the great anthracite coal strike of a decade or so ago, which, it will be remembered, was finally settled by the Coal Strike Commission appointed by President Roosevelt—of which Judge Gray was the chairman, and before which I had the honor of appearing as representing certain interests involved, I remember very well that when coal, during the strike, went up to frightful prices, $10 to $15 per ton at tidewater—certain of the individual operators and small corporations who were selling their coal at the breaker to the large companies at figures computed on a percentage of the average selling price of coal at tide—insisted on the large companies, as their agents, either compelling the public to pay these extravagant prices, or on the suspension of the sales contracts of their coal to the companies, so that they might themselves—if the companies did not do so—compel the public to pay the high prices which the large companies recognized were exorbitant and unwise; and in a number of instances I knew of the suspension of such contracts, forced by the individual operators, so that they might themselves take advantage of the temporary stringency in the coal supply, while the large companies continued throughout the strike and period of coal famine to sell such coal as they could command at reasonable prices—not from any spirit of benevolence, but because they knew it was good, broad business to do so.

How interesting it now is, in view of this recent instance, to turn back to 1875, and see how history repeats itself, and quote the following from Mr. Franklin B. Gowen's argument before a committee of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, appointed to inquire into the affairs of the then Reading companies. Speaking of the policy of the Reading Co. to sell its coal at reasonable rates, less than the rates which individual operators then demanded, he said:

"A large corporation such as we are is held by the public and by the representatives of the public to a strict accountability. We would not dare to do what individuals do. When individuals controlled this coal field during the war" (i. e., the Civil War) "$8 a ton was the price of coal at the mines. Do you think the Reading Railroad Co. would have dared to charge that sum, no matter how great the power it possessed? Do you suppose that a ton of coal which cost $2 at the mines could have been sold at a profit of $6 if the Reading Railroad Co. had owned it instead of individuals?" (The Reading Co. acquired its coal holdings after the war.) "A few individuals during the war were selling coal to the United States Government, to carry on the defense of the country, at a profit of from $3 to $4 a ton; but do you suppose such a thing would have been possible under a corporation? Why, if we had attempted it we should have been pilloried as monopolists and then executed as traitors; and yet these individuals who handled the product of our mines during the war, and who made money so enormously out of war prices, are the very persons represented by those who now attack us for making a monopoly of this trade. Would the legislature have appointed a committee to investigate the conduct of an individual if he had charged this high price for coal? Oh, no. But when we reduce the price to the injury of a Philadelphia retailer, the whole power of the State is invoked for our destruction. Hence, I say, I am a convert; and I believe, as the result of experience, that there is no better policy than that of enabling the railroad companies to develop the coal fields in which their lines are located."

When we talk of large aggregations of capital it is well to consider the good they have done and can do, with the apprehended evil. It will not do to assume broadly that what is mistermed the "monopolizing" of our coal interests, for instance, results in waste of our natural resources and in injustice to the public.

Perhaps one of the best summaries of this great conservation question now before our people, and in which the engineering profession is so interested, and in regard to which our mining profession has so great a duty to perform, was given by Dr. C. W. Hayes, Chief Geologist of the United States Geological Survey, in an address some time ago at the University of Chicago, when he defined conservation as "Utilization with a maximum efficiency and a minimum waste," and said:

"The reform that is needed throughout the country as a whole must gain its motive power not from sporadic instances where true business methods prevail, or from the well-intentioned enthusiasm of the few, but from the well-informed intelligence of the many. The campaign for conservation must be one of education.

"There appears to be an unfortunate confusion in the minds of certain advocates of conservation. They have apparently confused conservation of natural resources with destruction of the trusts, and the mixture has resulted in pure demagoguery. * * * Anyone who has studied conditions attending the development of mineral deposits must have been impressed by the fact that those deposits held by large companies are being developed and utilized with a view to prevention of waste, in accordance with the principles of conservation, to a much greater extent than are the deposits held by small companies or by individuals."

This matter, particularly in connection with the prospective development of our coal in Alaska, was gone into quite fully in the investigation of the Department of the Interior and of the Bureau of Forestry by the joint committee of Congress (the Pinchot investigation), and Mr. George Otis Smith, the Director of the United States Geological Survey, in testifying before this commission, said:

"Take the condition of the anthracite regions. As I understand it, the present conditions—we are talking from the standpoint of conservationists—the present situation, where large interests more or less control the whole field, is much preferable to the former condition of a large number of small operators who only took out a part of the coal and wasted more than they took out." And again in his testimony he said: "It is not monopolization that is the conserving agent, it is not the monopoly that conserves; it is the large unit that conserves. And I should say that the operation of the coal mines by the large and strong interests which control also the railroads in a given field would be a conserving practice, because it would involve large units. * * * I want to see the Government, by law, control the large unit. There is no use of arguing for the development of large units in industry, unless at the same time the control of the large units is given to the Government. But the large unit in itself is the thing to be sought. The day is past for small operation in any industry of this country, and if we wish to bring back the old conditions, and which still persist; if we wish to encourage the existence of small operations which mean nothing but wasteful competition, I think we would be working directly against the operation of natural law, and I do not think that natural law ought to be opposed either by Executive order or by legislative enactment."

Whether or not the conjunction of transportation and mining interests under one control may or may not be to the benefit of conservation and of the public is, however, now a matter of judicial investigation by the Government, and the future practice must be governed by the decision that shall be reached, but there seems to be a growing conviction among thoughtful men who have really studied the subject that concentration of capital and management must not necessarily be condemned as inimical to public interest. Of this President Taft said, in his message of January 7, 1910, to Congress on interstate commerce and antitrust laws and Federal incorporation: "Monopoly destroys competition utterly, and the restraint of the full and free operation of competition has a tendency to restrain commerce and trade. A combination of persons formerly engaged in trade as partnerships or corporations or otherwise, of course, eliminates the competition that existed between them; but the incidental ending of that competition is not to be regarded as necessarily a direct restraint of trade, unless of such an all-embracing character that the intention and effect to restrain trade are apparent from the circumstances, or are expressly declared to be the object of the combination. A mere incidental restraint of trade and competition is not within the inhibition of the act, but it is where the combination or conspiracy or contract is inevitably and directly a substantial restraint of competition, and so a restraint of trade, that the statute is violated." And speaking of the antitrust law Mr. Taft said: "It was not to interfere with a great volume of capital which, concentrated under one organization, reduced the cost of production and made its profit thereby, and took no advantage of its size by methods akin to duress to stifle competition with it. I wish to make this distinction as emphatic as possible, because I conceive that nothing could happen more destructive to the prosperity of this country than the loss of that great economy in production which has been and will be effected in all manufacturing lines by the employment of large capital under one management. I do not mean to say that there is not a limit beyond which the economy of management by the enlargement of plant ceases; and where this happens and combination continues beyond this point, the very fact shows intent to monopolize and not to economize."

Whether direct paternal governmental supervision of our industries (in addition to the relief from wrongdoing now open in the courts) would be wise will, I think, be questioned by most experienced business men and engineers. Whatever may be the outcome of the discussion on this point, the above citations show clearly that the main great principle here discussed, viz, that conservation can best be promoted by mining and by developing in large units, is recognized by the Government, and emphasized in the opinions of its officials from the President down through the technical men best qualified to express opinions.

The present agitation of the whole subject should have a high educational value for our people, and we may be certain we can trust the horse sense, the intelligence that in the long run always is characteristic of our people, not to be led away by isms or wild theories, but to use in the final determination of these questions that independence of judgment and sound common sense so characteristic of and inherent in the American people, and for which our politicians so often make the mistake of not giving the people credit.

Already the wiser, conservative view of conservation has been semi-officially enunciated in President Taft's address at the meeting of the conservation congress in Minneapolis, when, in concluding, he said:

"I am bound to say that the time has come for a halt in general rhapsodies over conservation, making the word mean every known good in the world; for after the public attention has been roused such appeals are of doubtful utility and do not direct the public to the specific course that the people should take, or have their legislators take, in order to promote the cause of conservation. The rousing of emotions on a subject like this, which has only dim outlines in the minds of the people affected, after a while ceases to be useful, and the whole movement will, if promoted on these lines, die for want of practical direction and of demonstration to the people that practical reforms are intended. * * * I beg of you, therefore, in your deliberations and in your informal discussions, when men come forward to suggest evils that the promotion of conservation is to remedy, that you invite them to point out the specific evils and the specific remedies; that you invite them to come down to details in order that their discussions may flow into channels that shall be useful rather than into periods that shall be eloquent and entertaining without shedding real light on the subject. The people should be shown exactly what is needed in order that they may make their representatives in Congress and the State legislatures do their intelligent bidding."

Gentlemen of the alumni of the Michigan College of Mines, it almost seems as if this was a direct appeal to the men of our profession to come forward and perform their public duty as engineers in giving their expert aid in carrying out these wise suggestions, to the end that the public may have the benefit of advice based on that experience which promotes good judgment, and that the mining engineers of the country may claim and exercise their due share in this great twentieth century movement to so regulate the development of the still latent mineral resources of our country that the lessons that have come down to us in the deliberations of our predecessors in the profession shall be heeded, and that the knowledge and training placed at the disposal of our country to-day by your great mining school, and by its sister schools in other sections of our country, may be availed of and be utilized to the due credit of your alma mater, and of the profession to which you belong, and to the lasting benefit of our country.

SANE WORDS ON CONSERVATION.

Dr. Henry S. Drinker, president of Lehigh University, delivered an address on conservation at the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Michigan College of Mines, at Houghton, last Saturday, which ought to be read carefully by all who take any interest in the subject. Dr. Drinker began his career as a young mining engineer and rose to high distinction in the profession, leaving a very lucrative practice a few years ago to head the famous institution on the Lehigh simply because he felt it his duty to instruct the rising generation of engineers out of the many resources of his own experience. On many occasions he has read papers on mining waste and cognate subjects, and it is doubtful if any living man has a closer practical knowledge of the subject.

His principal thesis in the address mentioned was that the resources of Alaska belong in part to this generation and that it is no part of wisdom or economy to bottle them up. If this is done, the coming generation will have the same problems to face as now. It was the policy of the last administration to reduce the opening of these resources to the lowest terms or restrict them entirely. In chief, its idea was that large corporations should be allowed to gain no foothold and only small mines were encouraged.

Dr. Drinker shows from history, from instances leading right up to the present day, that the small mining operator is always wasteful in his methods. Regardless of any other consideration it is held that he wastes most and gets least from the bowels of the earth, so that from the larger point of view he is a menace. On the other hand, the great corporations are always anxious to save every penny and practically nothing of value escapes. Dr. Drinker holds that from these considerations the "larger corporate unit" ought to be encouraged, because the country will be best served by it and lose least. He thinks the whole problem is one of making contracts with the larger unit.

This is a sane view which is held by the President himself and by practically all technical experts. The whole problem, therefore, reverts to the form of contract which is to be made, and Dr. Drinker believes there is wisdom enough in Congress to settle it properly if there be the willing mind. It is certain that something must be done, for our present policy is practically worse than the free-for-all which lasted so long. Congressmen should not be afraid of a few demagogues. They should consider the interest of the whole country.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, at a future time, when it shall be in order, I shall move to lay this resolution on the table.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I just came into the Hall and caught the remark of my colleague, in which I understood him to move to lay some resolution on the table. I would like to have it reported.

The SPEAKER. There is no motion in order at this time. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk proceeded to call the committees, the call resting with the Committee on Indian Affairs.

When the Committee on Labor was called:

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up House resolution 90.

Mr. MANN. Has that been transferred to the House Calendar?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It is now on the House Calendar.

Mr. MANN. At the proper time, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a point of order that it was transferred to the House Calendar without authority.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution at length.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this resolution should be on the Union Calendar. I understand the resolution was on the Union Calendar, but was transferred by the Clerk to the House Calendar. I think that transfer was erroneous. The latter part of the resolution provides:

> Said committee is hereby authorized to employ certain stenographic or clerical assistance as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying out the provisions and purposes of this resolution, and to pay the expense thereof, in a sum not to exceed in the aggregate $10,000, from the contingent fund of this House upon warrants signed by the chairman of said committee.

Now, I am familiar with the rulings of the Chair that resolutions reported from the Committee on Accounts providing for the payment of sums out of the contingent fund are not Union Calendar bills, although the wording of the rule would require the consideration of those resolutions in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Now, because an exception has been made in these cases, although the wording of the rule requiring that all bills and resolutions providing for an expenditure of money should be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, because of the wording of the resolution and the exception made on reports from the Committee on Accounts, my opinion does not warrant any further exception. I think there has been no exception to the wording of the resolution, except in those cases where the Committee on Accounts has reported providing for the payment of money out of the contingent fund. Undoubtedly that ruling grew up because the House was constantly called upon to pay small sums of money out of the contingent fund on resolutions reported from the Committee on Accounts, and it would be a great waste of time to require on each occasion the House to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. But when it comes to providing that there may be $10,000 paid out of the contingent fund by a resolution reported from a committee which ought not to have had jurisdiction of it at all, the shoe is on the other foot.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Illinois any decisions on the subject?

Mr. MANN. So far as I am informed—and I do not claim that I have complete information on the subject—I am familiar with no decision, nor do I recollect any attempt on the part of anyone claiming that a resolution like this would not have to go on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman this question: The decisions to the effect that resolutions from the Committee on Accounts segregating the contingent fund need not be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union evidently were rendered for two reasons; one, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois, that they were of so frequent occurrence that it would be a great waste of time to go through that process. And I will ask the gentleman from Illinois whether or not, in his opinion, there was not another reason, and that was that the contingent fund really has already been appropriated?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I personally do not think that was the reason, but I presume that has been assigned as a reason at some time. The Chair is familiar with the fact that once in a while, for possibly very good reasons, there has been a clear distinction made without any reason as between what you can do and what you can not do, as is the ruling declaring that the Navy is a continuing project, in order that improvements of the Navy may be in order, if it is a battleship, but that if it is a dry dock it is not in order. There is absolutely no distinction in reason, but there is in the precedent. The wording of the rule, it is very clear, covers the contingent fund, as far as the wording is concerned. The fact that the money has been appropriated makes no difference. We may have appropriated $150,000 for a public building at some place, but if you propose to change the authorization in any way, although the money has already been appropriated, it must go to the Union Calendar and be considered in the Committee of the Whole House—and not merely the appropriation of money, but the expenditure of money, the incurring of obligations which are payable in money.

In this case, under this resolution, there is authorized the expenditure of $10,000. We have already in two other cases authorized the expenditure of $25,000 in each case, a total of $60,000, although the fund out of which that may be paid does not equal $60,000.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. GARRETT. The Committee on Rules, to which this resolution ought to have been referred, and to which I have no doubt it would be referred if introduced now, in reporting the investigation resolution carefully refrained from including appropriations, upon the ground that that was the function of the Committee on Accounts, and that the Committee on Rules ought not to undertake to exercise jurisdiction over an appropriation out of the contingent fund, because it was peculiarly the function of the Committee on Accounts to deal with that contingent fund. Here is a resolution reported from another committee that undertakes to make an appropriation out of the contingent fund, and I venture to suggest to the Chair that a different rule would apply to any other committee of the House than to the Committee on Accounts in dealing with the contingent fund.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the Chair suggested that one of the reasons actuating the rulings in the past might have been that the contingent fund was already appropriated, but paragraph 3 of Rule XXIII, page 34, of the Manual, says:

> All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people; all proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made * * * shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole.

I grant you that the rulings have been, and I think should be, that where the Committee on Accounts reports a resolution for payment out of the contingent fund, it does not require to go upon the Union Calendar, but that is an arbitrary ruling, just exactly as the ruling in a current appropriation bill where you fix a salary, that that is law and the creation of office is not law, although both are in the same bill, or that providing a new battleship is a continuing project, but providing a dry dock to put it in is not a continuing project. That is an arbitrary ruling—a ruling that has the force of precedent, and that is properly observed—and in this case it is an arbitrary ruling which I think ought to be observed that the Committee on Accounts puts its resolutions on the House Calendar, but that any other committee proposing to pay money out of the contingent fund must place its resolutions on the Union Calendar, and that it must be considered in the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the Speaker to the extraordinary situation that the House finds itself in with this resolution. This resolution purports to provide for an investigation by the Committee on Labor of the operation of certain cost systems. As introduced the resolution did not purport to provide for the expenditure of money either out of the Treasury or out of the contingent fund.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes, it did.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As introduced?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The committee reports an amendment.

Mr. MANN. That is, limiting the amount to $10,000. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am mistaken, Mr. Speaker, but it purports to pay the expense of the investigation out of the contingent fund.

All resolutions, all proposals to pay out of the contingent fund of the House must, under the rule, be referred to the Committee on Accounts. The Committee on Accounts occupies a peculiar relationship to the House in its control over the contingent fund. The contingent fund is provided in an appropriation bill, and its purpose is to have available for the use of the House a fund against which may be charged expenditures necessary in the everyday transactions of the business of the House which can not be anticipated and foreseen and provided for in an annual appropriation. If the practice proposed here is to prevail that whenever any committee determines that it desires to investigate some question it will have introduced a resolution providing for an investigation and an expenditure out of the contingent fund, and then the committee that determines to make the investigation will pass upon the desirability of making the investigation, as well as the amount to be expended out of the contingent fund of the House, there can be no check kept upon the contingent fund of the House, because no committee and no House could ever keep up a supply to meet the demands that committees would be continually making upon it in this form. The ruling to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has called attention by which the uniform practice of the House has been varied in one respect is that resolutions reported by the Committee on Accounts and providing for payments out of the contingent fund need not be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; but that is a narrow ruling, restricted entirely to the Committee on Accounts, and it has never been suggested, nor has it ever been proposed, that if some other committee attempts to encroach upon the jurisdiction of the Committee on Accounts in its control of the contingent fund that it would have this preferential right to call up such a resolution in the House and by the operation of the previous question have speedy action taken without an opportunity for a proper and full consideration that should be given to such a resolution.

The Committee on Accounts can report resolutions providing for payments out of the contingent fund as privileged, but such resolutions are not privileged from other committees. The Committee on Accounts, not expending the money itself for investigations by itself, but acting as the auditor of the other committees and acting as the representatives of the House, standing between the House and the other committees, properly would have the right to have a speedy hearing by the House; but I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the ruling has never been extended to any other committee which has attempted to encroach upon the jurisdiction of the Committee on Accounts in its control over the contingent fund, and it should not be extended for a proper administration of the fund and for the protection of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York contend this bill ought to be referred to the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. GARRETT. It ought to go to the Union Calendar.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, Mr. Speaker, there might be some question as to whether this resolution should be referred to the Committee on Labor, or to the Committee on Rules, or to the Committee on Accounts. It provides for an expenditure out of the contingent fund. If it has not been referred to the Committee on Accounts, if some other committee attempts to exercise control over the contingent fund and reports such resolutions to the House, it seems to me that such resolutions should be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union so that the House may be fully informed.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman permit——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT. In answer to the suggestion of the Speaker, I think, of course, that a part of this resolution would have gone to the Committee on Rules and part of it would have gone to the Committee on Accounts, but under the well-settled practice it is too late to make that point of order now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not so certain as to that; unless this is a public bill, it is not too late.

Mr. GARRETT. But if it can come up now, and that is the point I was going to reach, if it can come up now on the House Calendar and not have to go to the Union Calendar, then you can not make the point of order; but if it be sent to the Union Calendar, where it belongs, then it would not be a privileged resolution for the reason that all matters touching the employment of the contingent fund of the House under the rule go to the Committee on Accounts, and to hold that this bill now can be considered, dealing with the contingent fund of the House, as a House bill and not on the Union Calendar, is to open the doors in a very dangerous way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, there is another matter that the House should consider which may not be quite pertinent at this particular point but still must not be overlooked.

The appropriation in the contingent fund out of which expenditures of this character may be made for the current year, if I recall correctly, is $75,000. Two committees have already been authorized to investigate various matters and to incur indebtedness or make an expenditure out of this fund, each not to exceed $25,000. The Committee on the District of Columbia was authorized to conduct an investigation; to expend not to exceed $5,000. These committees drew very little of the amount authorized from the contingent fund prior to the 1st of July, so that charges against this appropriation of $75,000 for the current year are possibly charges of $55,000.

These proposed expenditures should be referred to some committee that knows something about this account. This proposes to permit the employment of stenographic and clerical services at an expenditure of $10,000 a year. The Committee on Appropriations investigates estimates aggregating between six and seven hundred million dollars a year, and it uses the committee stenographers available for all committees of the House. It uses the annual clerks provided by law for the committee, and never, in my experience, has it been necessary for that committee to have a particular appropriation in the vast and comprehensive investigations it is compelled to make annually, and all the time, in order properly to discharge its duties. Ten thousand dollars for stenographic and clerical services for one committee of the House, for a special investigation will mean that; if it continues at that rate, $400,000 or $500,000 will be used up in a session of Congress, and all our professions of economy in the conduct of the business will be but idle dreams at the time we complete our work.

Mr. MANN. That is true, anyhow.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is very alert to the accuracy of that suggestion. It seems to me that since this resolution has not received the scrutiny of the committee which is specially charged under the rules of the House with the duty of protecting the contingent fund, it would be extremely unwise to extend the ruling and to make privileged and possible of consideration on the House Calendar resolutions affecting the contingent fund which some committees of the House propose to interject here. It seems to me this resolution should be on the Union Calendar, so that the House may take necessary steps to protect itself against such propositions.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania and Mr. CANNON rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] is recognized. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois next.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was originally placed on the Union Calendar when it was reported to the House. It has since been changed to the House Calendar. I presume, while I do not know, that that change has been made because of the ruling recently rendered by the Chair on a similar question. On the 24th of April Mr. LLOYD, from the Committee on Accounts, introduced a resolution—

That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House compensation at the rate, respectively, of $6 per day and $60 per month, for the services of a clerk and messenger to the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Executive Papers during the remainder of the present session.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] raised the point of order—

That this resolution and all like it, proposing to pay money out of the contingent fund of the House, must, under the rule, be considered in Committee of the Whole. I do this for the purpose of establishing a precedent which has hitherto been established in Democratic Houses but not followed in Republican Houses.

Upon that question the Speaker ruled as follows:

This is one of the happy situations in which the Chair can cite great names on both sides of the proposition. If it were an original question, the present occupant of the Chair would hold that the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia was well taken, but for the last 10 or 15 years resolutions similar to this one have been considered in the House with the universal acquiescence of Members on both sides. Therefore the point of order is overruled.

Now, the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] was not that expenditures proposed in resolutions coming from the Committee on Accounts are out of order, but propositions for expenditures from the contingent fund. This resolution simply proposes an expenditure from the contingent fund. The resolution itself, it seems to me, properly belongs to the Committee on Labor. The paramount question involved in the resolution is a question involving labor, and for that reason the resolution belongs with the Committee on Labor. As it was originally referred to the committee, it proposes to give to the committee practically unlimited powers in the expenditure of funds for stenographic and clerical help. The committee in reporting the bill proposes an amendment limiting that power of expenditure to $10,000.

The fact that we proposed that amendment does not in any manner change the status of the resolution as being properly before the Committee on Labor, and as the expenditure is from the contingent fund—an expenditure that has already been considered in the Committee of the Whole House—the resolution should be upon the House Calendar rather than upon the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, if this question touching the contingent fund were presented for the first time on a report from the Committee on Accounts, I have no doubt that the Speaker, under the language of clause 3 of Rule XXIII, would sustain the point of order, and direct the transfer of the resolution to the Union Calendar. I will read:

All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people, all proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made * * * shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole.

Now, there is no question, first, but that this is a resolution requiring a payment of money from the contingent fund on appropriation already made, and it comes literally within clause 3 of Rule XXIII. I am aware that for many Congresses—I do not recollect how many—but in both Democratic and Republican Houses, the Committee on Accounts being a privileged committee, and ordinarily bringing in privileged bills before the House touching the daily conduct of business for the convenience of the House, many Speakers have held that those resolutions need not go—or would not go under the rule—to the Union Calendar. If I recollect aright, when I had the honor to be Speaker of the House, following the precedents I made that ruling and no appeal was taken. The present Speaker of the House made that ruling at the commencement of this session, and I think he made it correctly, following the precedents.

But now what do we have? We have a committee, not the Committee on Accounts, that reports a bill, utilizing the form of a resolution—and "a resolution" is covered by the words "a bill"—to appropriate from the contingent fund or to utilize the contingent fund for the payment of the expenses of the committee. It may well be said, Can you make a distinction between committees when the contingent fund is to be utilized? Should it be confined to the Committee on Accounts alone? Under the precedents, as followed by many Speakers, yes. But you may say, Is one of the committees of the House to be discriminated against? Well, under the precedents, that has happened in other instances. I will call the attention of the Chair to Rule XXI, section 2, on page 400 of the new Manual—the Manual of the present session:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

Now, the invariable construction of that rule prohibits any legislation, or the report of any legislation, on any general appropriation bill, and forbids an appropriation that has not been previously authorized by law. The Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the various other appropriating committees are prohibited from reporting any legislation not authorized by law, and a point of order is invariably sustained. For instance, the Committee on Military Affairs can not report a bill or an item on a general appropriation bill—and if it does so the point of order would lie—to build a new Army post, to establish a new Army post, or to establish a new arsenal that may be necessary for the proper support of the military arm. The point of order would lie, unless such post or arsenal was previously authorized by law. That is true of the Appropriations Committee. But there is one exception, and that I call to the attention of the Chair. The Committee on Naval Affairs reports a general appropriation bill for the maintenance of the Navy. If I recollect aright, in the Forty-eighth or Forty-ninth Congress—I am not sure which—on a bill of that kind to maintain the Navy, the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. McCreary, while acting as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, overruled a point of order that was made against an item providing for the construction of a battleship, or several battleships, not authorized by law.

On a point of order which was very thoroughly debated, the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. McCreary, overruled the point of order and held the provision to be in order. An appeal was taken, and the House of Representatives at that time were so anxious to build battleships that had not been authorized by law that a majority of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union sustained the chairman of the committee. This precedent has been followed from that time to the present, in Democratic Houses and Republican Houses. I have frequently thought that the making of that exception has led to improvident legislation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he does not think that was really stretching the rule a good deal, anyway, when that decision was made?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, it was absolutely against the rule. When I had the honor to be chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that decision was invoked time and again. Amendments would be offered to a general appropriation bill, which, it was claimed—and perhaps correctly claimed in many instances—were for the good of the public service, with plausible statements that the Army was authorized and that public service was authorized and that these amendments were for the good of the service, and that they ought to be in order to a general appropriation bill. "But unless previously authorized by law," as provided in clause 2 of Rule XXI, the point of order has been invariably sustained.

Now, the two cases are exactly alike in principle. The Committee on Naval Affairs can report a general appropriation bill, or an amendment may be made to it to build a ship. The Committee on Accounts may report a resolution to utilize the contingent fund, and it is not subject to the point of order that it should go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; but those, so far as I recall, are the only two exceptions where not only the substance but the letter of the rule have been violated.

Now, I care nothing about whether this particular resolution is considered in the House, being on the House Calendar, or in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; but I do think it is important that there should not be a new precedent made that would enable gentlemen, instead of referring these matters to the Committee on Rules, to consider them in some other committee. It seems to me this resolution ought to have gone to the Committee on Rules; but with the many hundreds, thousands, and tens of thousands of bills being referred by the Speaker, mistakes are bound to occur. In my judgment, it was a mistake to refer this resolution to the Committee on Labor. I think it ought to have gone to the Committee on Rules; but it did not, and the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Labor gave that committee jurisdiction. It is reported and before us, and I do not believe that a precedent ought to be made that will enable any committee to avoid the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union by making reports of this kind. I think that privilege ought to be confined to the Committee on Accounts alone.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] raises the point of order that this resolution ought to be on the Union Calendar instead of the House Calendar.

The governing section about this is section 3 of Rule XXIII, found on page 413 of the Manual:

All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people; all proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property, or referring any claim to the Court of Claims, shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole, and a point of order under this rule shall be good at any time before the consideration of a bill has commenced.

Rule XIII, Calendars and Reports of Committees, section 729, page 361 of the Manual, says:

There shall be three calendars to which all business reported from committees shall be referred, viz:
First. A calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to which shall be referred bills raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills of a public character, directly or indirectly, appropriating money or property.

The third provision is Rule XI, section 56, the last clause on page 358, referring to privileged matters:

And the Committee on Accounts on all matters of expenditures of the contingent fund of the House.

The Chair agrees thoroughly with the statements made by the gentleman that this bill ought to go to the Union Calendar. The ruling of the present occupant of the Chair was simply on the question whether, when the Committee on Accounts reports a resolution segregating a part of the contingent fund or reappropriating it, it should go to the Committee of the Whole. The Chair stated that if it was an original proposition he would rule against it, but rulings of previous Speakers on both sides has been—and for 17 years, to the Chair's certain knowledge, nobody had raised that question—that where the Committee on Accounts reports a resolution taking a part of the contingent fund, it does not go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. That is the exception to the general rule, and it would be inadvisable, it seems to the Chair, from every point of view to enlarge the proposition that you can consider resolutions or bills appropriating money or things of value beyond the Committee on Accounts. For these reasons the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois is sustained.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Does sustaining the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois automatically take this resolution back on the Union Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs the Clerk to put the bill on the Union Calendar. It is fair to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to state that originally this bill was on the Union Calendar and was changed to the House Calendar. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] states the exact fact, that there are thousands of bills to be referred, and sometimes it happens that you can refer a bill with equal propriety to any one of two or three committees, and in the rush of matters it may go to the wrong committee. The Chair considers it no reflection whatever on his motives or integrity if the House changes it. This bill is now on the Union Calendar.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House resolution No. 90.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that that is not in order.

Mr. MANN. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that after 60 minutes expires that motion would be in order; but that time has not expired. The Clerk will continue the call of committees.

The Clerk continued the call of committees and called the Committee on Election of President and Vice President.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think we have been through with all of the committees. I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has the call of committees been completed?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the gentleman from New York withhold his motion until we can find out whether the call of committees has been completed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Illinois made the point of no quorum, and we will find out more quickly that way than any other.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the call of committees has not yet been completed.

Mr. MANN. We commenced with the Committee on Elections No. 1.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk began the call to-day with the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MANN. I will say that the committee of which the gentleman from Texas is chairman could not be called to-day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am interested in another committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will withdraw my motion, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on his point of order?

Mr. MANN. I insist on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-one Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 92, nays 155, answered "present" 5, not voting 133, as follows:

Mr. HEFLIN. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the call of committees.

When the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic was called:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I understood the Clerk to call the Committee on Elections. If I am mistaken——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was mistaken. The Clerk originally began with the Committee on Indian Affairs. The Clerk will proceed.

When the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions was called:

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions to call up House concurrent resolution No. 11, with amendments suggested by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

Concurrent resolution 11.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, earnestly requested to extend, in the name and on behalf of the city of Key West, Fla., to all foreign nations an invitation to visit that city and participate in the celebration of the completion of the Florida East Coast Railway Co.'s line connecting the mainland of the United States with the said island city of Key West, both by their official representatives and citizens generally, and particularly to invite such foreign countries to send such of their respective naval vessels as may be practicable and convenient to participate in such celebration so to be held, beginning on the 2d day of January, A. D. 1912: Provided, That before the extending of said invitations the President shall be satisfied that suitable provisions have been made by said city for the entertainment of the parties or representatives of such governments or countries so invited.

Resolved further, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to direct such portion of the Army and Navy of the United States as may be convenient and practicable to be present at Key West at the time of such proposed celebration and participate therein.

Resolved further, That under no circumstances is the United States to assume, be subject to, or charged with any expense of any character whatsoever in or about or connected with such proposed celebration.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order, first, that this resolution must be on the Union Calendar. Second, that it violates the statute by inserting a resolving clause three times; and third, that it is not possible by a concurrent resolution to direct the President to do anything.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask unanimous consent to substitute for the House resolution Senate concurrent resolution No. 7. This resolution, which is practically the same, has passed the Senate and is on the Speaker's table, and I ask unanimous consent to substitute that resolution for this one.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hold in abeyance the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Let us have the Senate resolution reported with the request.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate resolution——

Mr. MANN. As a part of the request of the gentleman from Alabama.

The SPEAKER. As a part of the request of the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 7.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit in the name and on behalf of the city of Key West, Fla., to all foreign nations an invitation to visit that city and participate in the celebration of the completion of the Florida East Coast Railway Co.'s line connecting the mainland of the United States with the said island city of Key West, both by their official representatives and citizens generally, and particularly to invite such foreign countries to send such of their respective naval vessels as may be practicable and convenient to participate in such celebration so to be held, beginning on the 2d day of January, A. D. 1912: Provided, That before the extending of said invitations the President shall be satisfied that suitable provisions have been made by said city for the entertainment of the parties or representatives of such Governments or countries so invited.

Resolved further, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to direct such portion of the Army and Navy of the United States as may be convenient and practicable to be present at Key West at the time of such proposed celebration and participate therein.

Resolved further, That under no circumstances is the United States to assume, be subject to, or charged with any expense of any character whatsoever in or about or connected with such proposed celebration.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, this is practically the same resolution——

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will suspend for a moment. The request of the gentleman from Alabama is that the House resolution lie on the table and that the Senate resolution just read by the Clerk be substituted for it. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair will now inquire of the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the same point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be pleased if the gentleman will restate it.

Mr. MANN. First, that the resolution must go on the Union Calendar and be considered in the Committee of the Whole House. Second, that Congress can not by a concurrent resolution direct the President to do anything. The resolution in its present form is in violation of the statute, and I simply lay the matter before the Chair. This is a concurrent resolution. There is on the calendar a joint resolution reported from the same committee covering identically the same question at another place. Just what distinction the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions makes between a concurrent resolution to have the President do something, a concurrent resolution not requiring the signature or approval of the President in the one case, and a joint resolution which does require the approval of the President in the other case, I do not know.

It does not seem to me that the House and Senate combined can by a concurrent resolution give the President authority to do anything. It is true that the resolution only provides that the President is requested to extend to all foreign nations an invitation, but the President derives his authority from the action of Congress. Without the action of Congress the President has no authority to extend the invitation, and the action of Congress means a resolution passed under the Constitution, and a resolution passed under the Constitution must be presented to the President for approval or disapproval. But under the practice a concurrent resolution is not considered a resolution affecting anything outside of the mere matter of procedure in the two Houses of Congress; is not a resolution under the Constitution; it is not required to be presented to the President for approval or disapproval. If the gentleman desires to make his resolution a joint resolution, I do not know that I should object to the request. As to whether the resolution has to be considered in Committee of the Whole, the third clause of the resolution, which has "resolved further" in it, although the statutes, in the case of a joint resolution, at least, would forbid the use of the resolving clause more than once, is—that under no circumstances is the United States to assume, be subject to, or charged with, any expense of any character whatsoever, in or about, or connected with such proposed celebration.

Apparently, that would prevent this resolution causing any expenditure of money or making any charge upon the Treasury, and yet, if you will notice the resolution, it is simply in connection with the celebration, because the second clause of the resolution directs the President to send the Army and Navy to Key West, and that means necessarily an expenditure of money. Neither the Army nor the Navy can be sent to Key West without incurring obligations for that purpose.

Mr. GARRETT. There have been resolutions passed in the House without being considered in Committee of the Whole that did that, have there not?

Mr. MANN. It is very likely. I do not recall them at this time.

Mr. GARRETT. My recollection is, although I may be in error about it, that the resolution authorizing the President to invite the navies of the world to the Jamestown Exposition passed through the House and was not considered in Committee of the Whole. I may be mistaken about it.

Mr. MANN. I will assume, for the purpose of argument, that it did pass through the House without being considered in Committee of the Whole. But the gentleman will recollect that it cost the Government several hundred thousand dollars afterwards, and that is simply proof of what I am saying, that the necessary effect is the incurring of obligations and the expenditure of money.

Mr. GARRETT. I think the point of order was made then and overruled, but I am not certain about it. I believe it was.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama, so far as I am personally concerned, while I really object to the merits of the proposition in that it says that the Government shall incur no expense, I think when the Government of the United States asks its naval officers to go to a place to meet other naval officers of other navies at the expense of our naval officers, and we are too niggardly to pay the expense ourselves out of the Treasury, we are too niggardly to extend the invitation. Here is a case where we propose to send our Navy and ask other navies to come. We know that that means that our naval officers must entertain the naval officers of the other navies at their own personal expense, receiving not a dollar out of the Treasury. In some cases where such things have been done it has bankrupted the naval officers. The officers of a vessel giving an entertainment or a dinner, and paying for it themselves, as the officers feel they must do, means that they have to pay out large sums of money. However, I will say to the gentleman from Alabama, that if he will change this to a joint resolution, so it would be of some effect, I will withdraw the points of order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, replying to the gentleman from Illinois, who really has no objection, I believe, to the passage of the resolution, since it carries no appropriation whatever, I wish to say it does not take one dollar out of the Treasury. It merely requests the President of the United States to extend this invitation, but he does not even have to do that unless he wishes to do so.

This resolution has in it a courtesy that this Congress can extend to the people of Florida in the celebration of the completion of a great engineering enterprise there, and my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has made no argument that would sustain his point of order. He suggests that we ought to pay the expenses when any part of the Navy is called out on occasions like this. Why, Mr. Speaker, if that resolution had an appropriation in it of $5, the minority leader would now be throwing fits in the aisle over by the door. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

When it is cold, he wants it hot;
He is always wanting what is not.

[Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there is no one else who wants to oppose the resolution, I do not care to discuss it further.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question. Section 3 of Rule XXIII reads in this wise:

All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people; all proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property * * * shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, this resolution especially provides that no expense shall be incurred by the Government under any circumstances. That is part of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to ask the gentleman from Alabama about the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that while no appropriation is specifically prohibited, it still costs something to send this fleet round about.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, in response to that, that the South Atlantic Squadron is always down in that section, and it would not cost the Government anything in addition to regular or ordinary expenses.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It would not cost anything; not a cent.

Mr. HEFLIN. No; it would not cost anything.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has no time to yield. This is a question of order.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is to that I wish to address myself.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Florida wish to address himself to a question of order?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. I wish to speak on the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], on the ground that this resolution provides for the expenditure of money on the part of the Government. As to that, I wish to say that if this resolution means anything in the world, it means that the Government is to expend nothing whatever upon the celebration contemplated by the resolution. The language is very plain and means what it says. Now, what will be the result? The President of the United States, if this resolution is passed, will not be directed to do anything, but will only be requested to extend an invitation to foreign countries to participate in the way pointed out, the Government to be put to no expense by way of entertainment or otherwise. What else is he to do? He is to cause a portion, or such portions of the Army and the Navy as he may see proper—I do not know that I am quoting the exact language—to be sent to Key West, again without expense to the Government. The result will be that either the Government will not spend anything for sending them, or else the troops and vessels will not go there, for the President, if any expense is to be incurred, would not send them, if he follows the directions in this resolution.

And I want to say here that Key West, and not only Key West, but the greater part of this railroad, the completion of which is to be celebrated, is in the district which I have the honor to represent here, and I know the people there, and I know full well that when they extend an invitation to anybody they are prepared to meet and will meet all the expenses incident upon the visit their invited guests may make, no matter whether they be their own fellow citizens or representatives of foreign countries.

Now, when the President comes to send out this invitation on behalf of the people of Key West or comes to consider the question of sending a part of the Navy or of the Army to Key West, he may, if he so desires, require specific assurance that the funds which the Government might otherwise have to pay will be forthcoming, and there is nothing in this resolution which will force him to do it until he is satisfied that all expenses will be met. As for myself, knowing those people as I do, knowing them to be among the most hospitable, the most generous, and enterprising people in the world, I should require nothing by way of a guaranty save their word, already given, that these expenses would be met by them. Indeed, to me the fact they extend the invitation, even though it be through the President, would furnish ample assurance that the expenses incident to the visit would be met by them.

I know something of affairs like this, Mr. Speaker, because I have had to do with just this class of celebrations before. We have had several such in the city of Tampa, my home town, where the President of the United States, through the War Department, has been called upon to send a portion of the Army and of the Navy to participate in fairs and exhibitions held there; and in one case at least troops were sent there at the expense of the promoters of the exposition.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Florida a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Florida yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. Is the East Coast Railroad Co. a private corporation?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is a quasi-public corporation—public in the sense that all railroad corporations are public corporations.

Mr. COOPER. Its business is the carrying of freight and passengers for money, is it not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. Earning dividends for its stockholders?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I suppose so.

Mr. COOPER. The Government of the United States is not interested in it, through any land grant or any contribution of money, is it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. None whatever, so far as I know.

Mr. COOPER. It is purely private?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is purely private, in that sense, I fancy.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman know when any other purely private corporation, having finished a big job like this, or a dry-goods company, or a railroad company, or any other kind of private concern, has had the Army and the Navy sent to celebrate its completion and the nations of the world have been invited?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; I do not know of any, nor does the gentleman know of any proposition like this, for the simple reason that there has never before been such an undertaking recorded in the engineering history of the world. There has never been anything like it anywhere, and if there has ever been a project conceived by a private individual and carried out by private enterprise, railroad or other engineering work, that should challenge the patriotic consideration of this House and of the whole country, it is this project. [Applause.] I should be surprised if anyone here would refuse or fail to vote for this resolution, which simply undertakes to stamp the approval of Congress and of the Executive upon a proposition to celebrate the completion of a great enterprise like this, national in its character, when the Government is to be at no expense.

Mr. Speaker, as I said at the outset, this resolution provides that the Government shall be at no cost in accepting and in carrying out the provisions of the resolution, and if that means anything in the world, it means what it says and nothing else. The Government must pay the officers of the Navy and the Army. It must pay the soldiers and sailors, it must feed them, whether they are in Key West or elsewhere. Some portion of the fleet is always in these waters, and especially in the winter, some portion of the Army at all times within easy reach, and I undertake to say that every dollar necessary to meet the expense of transporting any troops that will be sent there will be furnished by the people of Key West. [Applause.] I therefore insist that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. Speaker, I have said that this project, the completion of which is to be celebrated in Key West next January, is the greatest event conceived or undertaken by a private individual, and so it is. There is nothing like it recorded in the history of the world. Railroads have been built across continents and through wild and unsettled portions of the country. They have been driven under great rivers, through mountains, and over their highest ranges, but never before has one been constructed far out over the sea. Starting near the southernmost portion of the mainland of Florida, this road has been built over keys and channels and islands to Key West, more than 125 miles away, and that, too, in a manner so substantial that a train of cars laden with freight and passengers may be run as safely over those storm-swept seas as it might on the mainland of Florida or any other State in the Union. Certainly, a work like this, illustrating, as it does in such a marked degree, that spirit of enterprise, distinctly American, which has made of this in a little more than a century the greatest Nation of the world, may be considered national in its character and worthy of recognition by the great American Congress, at least to the extent that the passage of this resolution would give it recognition.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another feature that makes the completion of this road a matter of national importance. The island of Key West is a point of great strategic importance from a naval and military standpoint. The city of Key West is the most southerly city in the United States and with a large and commodious harbor capable of great development at reasonable cost when results are considered. Lying within 6 hours run of the island of Cuba and within 24 of the western end of that island, a fleet assembled in her waters can easily command both the straits of Florida and the Yucatan Channel, and thus render safe from every foe the commerce of the Gulf, besides being in a position to render valuable aid in the protection of the Panama Canal. Her importance in that regard was early in her history recognized by the United States Government, for as far back as 1822, three years after Florida became a possession of the United States, a naval station was established at Key West, where it has been maintained ever since, and that, too, while the only means of reaching that station has been by water. Assuredly a project which will unite this island with the mainland by rail is national in its character and should receive even more encouragement than that which this resolution provides. I trust there may on the final vote be no opposition to the resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is overruled. [Applause.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out all the resolving clauses in the Senate resolution after the first one.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out the two superfluous clauses. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely certain that the House ought to pass this resolution. I appreciate the desire of the people of Florida to celebrate the extension of the railroad connecting the Keys with the mainland. And yet this is purely a private enterprise, practically the enterprise of one citizen.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, the motion I made was to strike out the superfluous resolves, and I would like to know under what head the gentleman is speaking.

Mr. MANN. I was under the impression that when the gentleman offered an amendment he yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama had yielded the floor, because the Chair had started to put the question. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor in his own right.

Mr. HEFLIN. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the question before the House.

Mr. MANN. I fail to understand how it is possible to discuss a motion to strike out a portion of the resolution without discussing the paragraph.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of taking up the time of the House unnecessarily, I am simply calling the attention of the House to the fact that in times past we have almost run riot on the subject of exhibitions and expositions, but so far as my memory serves me this is the first time in the history of the House when it has been proposed to send the Army and the Navy at the expense of the Government to celebrate the completion of a private railroad. If that is the economy of the Democratic House, make the most of it. We have heard a great deal about how the Democratic House proposed to economize, and yet the first substantial piece of legislation almost is to send the Army and the Navy to this place—sending the Army over this railroad—at the expense of the Government to celebrate the opening of a Standard Oil railroad. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am not in sympathy with the purpose of this resolution, but I do not believe the criticisms of the gentleman from Illinois are well founded. This does not compel the Army and the Navy to be sent to this private celebration. That responsibility will be on the President of the United States. Some gentlemen believe that it will help their section of the country to have this celebration. I am not so sure that it would not be just as desirable to send part of the Navy down to the east coast of Florida to participate in this movement in an effort to develop that section of the country, as it would to have it spend the summer along the New England coast booming summer resorts. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] If such favors are to be granted, let them be distributed fairly and equally, and if the Executive desires to take the responsibility for the present practice of having the Navy spend its summer along the New England coast in order to boom summer resorts, it might not be unwise to have it help celebrate the completion of this railroad, even if it is done under private auspices. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, if no one else wishes to be heard, I move the previous question on the resolution and amendment to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pages 1 and 2, strike out the resolving phrase on both pages.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing that the amendment should be changed, although the gentleman has no authority to make any change after the previous question is ordered. He does not want to strike out the resolving clause on the first page.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by striking out the two superfluous resolving clauses, the second and third. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate resolution as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were 109 ayes and 45 noes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand the previous question has been ordered. If the House adjourns now, will this roll call take place the first thing to-morrow morning, to-morrow being Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. MANN. I should think it would take place; it would be merely the roll call.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On an ordinary day, Mr. Speaker, the previous question having been ordered, this would be the unfinished business, and the roll call would take place the first thing in the morning.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly that is correct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, the question has never been decided, but I do not understand that the business of Calendar Wednesday interferes with the unfinished business of the day.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Alabama allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman from Alabama wish to intimate that a rule of this House touching the previous question and unfinished business can override the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was not aware the Constitution of the United States was involved. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will enlighten me in my ignorance.

Mr. CANNON. It was involved when Calendar Wednesday was held sacred as against the Constitution. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, that was only a small portion of the Constitution. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my request.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the matter is very plain in the rule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have withdrawn the request, and I suggest to my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] that he ask for tellers, so as to see whether we develop a quorum or not.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I will ask for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that whenever a quorum fails to develop on any question, and a quorum is not present and objection is made for that cause, unless the House shall adjourn there shall be a call of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I suggest this: That the Speaker has not counted to ascertain whether a quorum is present, and has not made the announcement that a quorum is not present. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], in order to expedite the business of the evening, that he call for tellers, in order that we may get through.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there is no provision for calling for tellers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He has the right to call for tellers.

Mr. MANN. Not when the point of no quorum is made. He has not the right to do anything until we ascertain the presence or the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Chair ascertain whether there is a quorum present.

Mr. MANN. The Chair has already announced.

The SPEAKER. The situation is this, as the Chair remembers it: The Chair announced ayes 109, noes 45. The Chair did not say whether there was a quorum present or not, but every Member understands the multiplication table, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] raised the point of no quorum.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that a number of gentlemen on this side did not vote either way, and also some on the other side of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the Speaker counting a quorum at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put the question again. Those in favor of the proposition will rise and remain standing until counted. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty gentlemen have voted in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and remain standing until counted. [After counting.] Forty-seven gentlemen have voted in the negative.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CULLOP. I would suggest that in order to determine whether a quorum is present, the Speaker ascertain those who are paired. A number of gentlemen did not vote either way. That is important to determine whether there is a quorum present or not.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the Chair that I counted 26 gentlemen who did not vote.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 139, nays 71, answered "present" 19, not voting 156, as follows:

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of certain bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEFLIN. The call is still with the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the motion of the gentleman from Texas should prevail, would the call remain with that committee and be taken up again?

The SPEAKER. It would. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider bills from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that these bills be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. You would have to couple with that a request to vacate the order of the House that has been passed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The order has not been passed.

The SPEAKER. The announcement has not been made. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What are the bills?

Mr. SHEPPARD. There are four emergency bills relating to Newark, Ohio——

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman will call up the first bill.

SITE FOR PUBLIC BUILDING AT NEWARK, OHIO.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire first to call up the bill (H. R. 13276) to provide for the disposal of the present Federal building site at Newark, Ohio, and for the purchase of a new site for such building.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to dispose of the present Federal building site near the corner of First and East Main Streets in Newark, Ohio, in such manner and upon such terms as he may deem for the best interests of the United States, and to convey such site to the purchaser thereof by the usual quitclaim deed, the proceeds of the sale thereof to be applied on the purchase of a new site; and to acquire by exchange for such present site, or in part by exchange and in part by purchase, or by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a new site for said building, the cost of such new site to be paid from the funds already appropriated or authorized for said building site. Such new site shall be centrally and conveniently located and of such size that an open space of such width, including streets and alleys, as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine, may be maintained about the Federal building when constructed, for the protection thereof from fire in adjacent buildings.

accommodation of the post office and other Government offices at Bangor, Me., at a cost for said site and building of not exceeding $400,000.

An open space of such width, including streets and alleys, as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine shall be maintained about said building for the protection thereof from fire in adjacent buildings.

For the purposes aforesaid the sum of $150,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the balance of the appropriation heretofore made by the sundry civil act of June 25, 1910, for the retaining wall and approaches at the former post-office building in said city, is hereby reappropriated and made immediately available, in addition to the appropriation hereinbefore made, toward the purposes of this act.

And the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed to sell, in such manner and upon such terms as he may deem for the best interests of the United States, the site and remains of the former post-office building in said city recently destroyed by fire; to convey the last-mentioned land to such purchaser or purchasers by the usual quit-claim deed, and to deposit the proceeds derived from such sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt.

Insert at the proper place the following:

"That the Tariff Board is hereby authorized, upon the complaint of any importer or upon its own initiative, to inquire as to whether the importations of any dutiable article have been for the year preceding such inquiry less than one-tenth of the total production of similar articles in the United States; and if it shall appear that such importations do not equal one-tenth of the production of similar articles in the United States, such board shall report the fact to the President of the United States, and thereupon the duty on such article shall be reduced at the rate of 10 per cent per annum until the importations thereof shall for one year equal one-tenth of the production of similar articles in the United States, whereupon any further reduction of such duty hereunder shall cease and the subject matter shall be reported to Congress for its action. But if, after such reduction has ceased, the importations of any dutiable article shall diminish so as to bring such importations below one-tenth of the consumption of similar articles for the period of one year, such annual reduction shall be resumed until the importations thereof shall equal one-tenth of the total annual production of similar articles in the United States, whereupon any further reduction of such duty shall cease and report thereof shall be made to Congress for its action. The President of the United States shall from time to time make proclamation of such reductions."

Mr. NEWLANDS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PUBLICITY OF CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the report of the committee of conference on the so-called publicity bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate the conference report on House bill 2958, which will be read.

The Secretary read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2958) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 6.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same, amended to read as follows, viz:

C., a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent, from any source, in aid or support of his candidacy, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part; and such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value given, contributed, expended, used, or promised by such candidate, or by his agent, representative, or other person for and in his behalf with his knowledge and consent, together with the names of all those to whom any and all such gifts, contributions, payments, or promises were made, for the purpose of procuring his nomination or election.

C., a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent, from any source, in aid or support of his candidacy, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part; and such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value given, contributed, expended, used, or promised by such candidate, or by his agent, representative, or other person for and in his behalf with his knowledge and consent, together with the names of all those to whom any and all such gifts, contributions, payments, or promises were made for the purpose of procuring his nomination or election.

"Every such candidate for nomination at any primary election or nominating convention, or for indorsement or election at any general or special election, or for election by the legislature of any State, shall, within 15 days after such primary election or nominating convention, and within 30 days after any such general or special election, and within 30 days after the day upon which the legislature shall have elected a Senator, file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives or with the Secretary of the Senate, as the case may be, a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent, from any source, in aid or support of his candidacy, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part; and such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value given, contributed, expended, used, or promised by such candidate, or by his agent, representative, or other person for and in his behalf with his knowledge and consent, up to, on, and after the day of such primary election, nominating convention, general or special election, or election by the legislature, together with the names of all those to whom any and all such gifts, contributions, payments, or promises were made for the purpose of procuring his nomination, indorsement, or election.

"Every such candidate shall include therein a statement of every promise or pledge made by him, or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent or to whom he has given authority to make any such promise or pledge, before the completion of any such primary election or nominating convention or general or special election or election by the legislature, relative to the appointment or recommendation for appointment of any person to any position of trust, honor, or profit, either in the county, State, or Nation, or in any political subdivision thereof, or in any private or corporate employment, for the purpose of procuring the support of such person or of any person in his candidacy, and if any such promise or pledge shall have been made the name or names, the address or addresses, and the occupation or occupations, of the person or persons to whom such promise or pledge shall have been made, shall be stated, together with a description of the position relating to which such promise or pledge has been made. In the event that no such promise or pledge has been made by such candidate, that fact shall be distinctly stated.

"No candidate for Representative in Congress or for Senator of the United States shall promise any office or position to any person, or to use his influence or to give his support to any person for any office or position for the purpose of procuring the support of such person, or of any person, in his candidacy; nor shall any candidate for Senator of the United States give, contribute, expend, use, or promise any money or thing of value to assist in procuring the nomination or election of any particular candidate for the legislature of the State in which he resides, but such candidate may, within the limitations and restrictions and subject to the requirements of this act, contribute to political committees having charge of the disbursement of campaign funds.

"No candidate for Representative in Congress or for Senator of the United States shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise, or cause to be given, contributed, expended, used, or promised, in procuring his nomination and election, any sum, in the aggregate, in excess of the amount which he may lawfully give, contribute, expend, or promise under the laws of the State in which he resides: Provided, That no candidate for Representative in Congress shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise any sum, in the aggregate, exceeding $5,000 in any campaign for his nomination and election; and no candidate for Senator of the United States shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise any sum, in the aggregate, exceeding $10,000 in any campaign for his nomination and election: Provided further, That money expended by any such candidate to meet and discharge any assessment, fee, or charge made or levied upon candidates by the laws of the State in which he resides, or for his necessary personal expenses, incurred for himself alone, for travel and subsistence, stationery and postage, writing or printing (other than in newspapers), and distributing letters, circulars, and posters, and for telegraph and telephone service, shall not be regarded as an expenditure within the meaning of this section, and shall not be considered any part of the sum herein fixed as the limit of expense and need not be shown in the statements herein required to be filed.

"The statements herein required to be made and filed before the general election, or the election by the legislature at which such candidate seeks election, need not contain items of which publicity is given in a previous statement, but the statement required to be made and filed after said general election or election by the legislature shall, in addition to an itemized statement of all expenses not theretofore given publicity, contain a summary of all preceding statements.

"Any person, not then a candidate for Senator of the United States, who shall have given, contributed, expended, used, or promised any money or thing of value to aid or assist in the nomination or election of any particular member of the legislature of the State in which he resides, shall, if he thereafter becomes a candidate for such office, or if he shall thereafter be elected to such office without becoming a candidate therefor, comply with all of the provisions of this section relating to candidates for such office, so far as the same may be applicable; and the statement herein required to be made, verified, and filed after such election shall contain a full, true, and itemized account of each and every gift, contribution, expenditure, and promise whenever made, in any wise relating to the nomination or election of members of the legislature of said State, or in any wise connected with or pertaining to his nomination and election of which publicity is not given in a previous statement.

"Every statement herein required shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the candidate, taken before an officer authorized to administer oaths under the laws of the State in which he is a candidate, and shall be sworn to or affirmed by the candidate in the district in which he is a candidate for Representative, or the State in which he is a candidate for Senator in the Congress of the United States: Provided, That if at the time of such primary election, nominating convention, general or special election, or election by the State legislature said candidate shall be in attendance upon either House of Congress as a Member thereof, he may at his election verify such statements before any officer authorized to administer oaths in the District of Columbia: Provided further, That the depositing of any such statement in a regular post office, directed to the Clerk of the House of Representatives or to the Secretary of the Senate, as the case may be, duly stamped and registered within the time required herein shall be deemed a sufficient filing of any such statement under any of the provisions of this act.

"This act shall not be construed to annul or vitiate the laws of any State, not directly in conflict herewith, relating to the nomination or election of candidates for the offices herein named, or to exempt any such candidate from complying with such State laws."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate amending the title of the bill and agree to the same with an amendment so that the title as amended will read as follows, viz:

"An act to amend an act entitled 'An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected' and extending the same to candidates for nomination and election to the offices of Representative and Senator in the Congress of the United States and limiting the amount of campaign expenses."

And the Senate agree to the same.

ROBERT J. GAMBLE,
JOS. F. JOHNSTON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
W. W. RUCKER,
M. F. CONRY,
M. E. OLMSTED,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

DECISION OF QUESTIONS CONCERNING CONSTITUTIONALITY.

Mr. BOURNE. I move to take up for second reading and reference to the Committee on the Judiciary the bill (S. 3222) to provide rules for speedy and final decision of questions concerning the constitutionality of national and State laws and constitutional provisions and for the interpretation and construction of the Federal laws and Constitution.

Mr. HEYBURN. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the regular order now. The morning business is closed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Matters on the table are not regular order. That is on the table.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is a motion to take up from the table, and it is in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask for information, Has morning business been disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; morning business has been disposed of.

Mr. HEYBURN. The bill does not come over like a resolution or any other matter on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from Oregon, who called up the matter, which is equivalent to a motion to consider it. He has moved regularly that the bill have its second reading and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HEYBURN. That motion has not yet——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill be read the second time? That is the question before the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not think it is in order to take matters from the table under this order of business in that way. When an objection is made to the second reading of a bill the matter of course goes to the table; it does not come up automatically. The Senator has recognized that fact, and has asked that it be taken up.

I am not going to attempt to occupy the time of the Senate for the purpose of preventing the progress of this bill, provided I have the attention of the Senate. If I do not have its attention, I will occupy its time; I will have one or the other.

Mr. CULLOM. We will give you both.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please be in order and give their attention to the remarks of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I listened with much interest to the suggestions made yesterday by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] as to the practice of halting measures at the second reading. I agree with what he then stated, that it is a rule that should be exercised with great infrequency and only under peculiar circumstances. If a measure was sought to be introduced into this body providing for the abolition of the Treasury of the United States, I assume that the Senator from Georgia would concede such a proposition would be unworthy of the attention of the Senate and improper to be made the subject of consideration by the body or by its committees. A proposition to abolish the Supreme Court of the United States should not be considered by the Senate, and it is entirely proper——

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; for a question.

Mr. BOURNE. I will ask the Senator from Idaho if the bill that I have fathered and introduced here proposes to abolish the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. HEYBURN. It proposes to abolish the functions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and would in effect abolish the Supreme Court of the United States. That term would be entirely applicable to the bill. Nine men sitting on the bench do not constitute the Supreme Court of the United States. They must have behind them a charter of authority. They constitute a court not by reason of their personality, but by reason of the power that is invested in them and the duties which devolve upon them. That is the court—the power. The Constitution——

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. In a moment. The Constitution of the United States confers upon the Supreme Court of the United States judicial power. That is distinguished from any power that is conferred upon Congress. The language of the Constitution defines and limits the powers conferred upon Congress; it defines and limits the powers conferred upon the President, the Executive; but it does not define or limit the powers conferred upon the Supreme Court of the United States. Those powers are all contained within the words "judicial power." It is vested there, and it is not within our province or power to either modify it, detract from it, or take it away. So any measure which proposes to do either of those things is not a fit subject of legislation or a fit subject for consideration.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. BOURNE. Then, as I understand the Senator from Idaho, he concludes that the bill as introduced is wholly unconstitutional?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not only wholly unconstitutional, but it is scandalous in that it proposes to violate the fundamental law of the land. I attack it as I would a pleading.

Mr. BOURNE. If it is unconstitutional, the Senator is not afraid of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate reporting against it for that reason, is he?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I want to do what I can to discourage the habit, which might grow under neglect, of exploiting doctrines that are fundamentally dangerous to the existence of the Government. I do not believe in these secret bombs being placed in the vaults of the committee room in the hope that some day some committee may use them for the purposes for which they are calculated.

Mr. BOURNE. Well, I should say, Mr. President, that the Senator's contention was a reflection upon the committee itself.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; it is not a reflection on the committee at all. I am not dealing in trivialities. Of course, one could get up a line of reasoning of that kind, and if he had the disposition of Jack Bunsby, he might come out somewhere, perhaps, with a "wherefore" or a "why"; but I am serious in this matter. Naturally I have duties quite sufficient to occupy my time and my strength, and I am not out seeking opportunities either to speak for or against any question. I am, however, impelled to take advantage of every occasion and opportunity to repel attacks upon our Government and its principles. Being in that frame of mind, I am not inclined to allow a measure of this kind to find a resting place in any committee of this body.

It first comes to this Senate before it goes to a committee, and it is within the province and duty of the Senate to sift measures before they are sent to occupy the time and attention of the committees of this body; otherwise bills would go directly to a committee before coming to the Senate. I am acting well within the intention and the scope of the procedure laid down for the government of this body when I object to a bill passing to the second reading, in order that the attention of more than the committee may be directed to it.

This Senate is responsible to the country for the indorsement, for the recognition which it gives to proposed legislation as well as to enacted laws. We are the custodians of political morals so far as they affect legislation, as we are the custodians of the responsibility that follows our action.

It is fortunate that we are seldom called upon to exercise this power. Not within my experience, extending over a considerable number of years, has such a proposition been presented to the Senate of the United States as that printed in this bill, for which the Senator from Oregon now seeks the recognition of the Senate and asks that the Senate may send it to a standing committee with the indorsement that it is a subject worthy of consideration and inquiry.

Mr. President, the first suggestion I made again becomes pertinent. Would the Senate send to a committee for consideration a bill that proposed to abolish the Treasury of the United States and substitute nothing in its stead? Would the Senate send to a committee for its responsible consideration a bill that proposed in express terms that the Supreme Court of the United States should not decide a given case in a stated manner? Would the Senate of the United States stamp with its approval as worthy of consideration a bill that proposed to direct the President of the United States in what manner he should exercise a power vested exclusively in the President?

This bill proposes to direct the Supreme Court of the United States how it shall render its judgment and upon what judgment it shall arrive at its conclusion. It undertakes to say that a majority of that court shall no longer constitute the responsible court. We could as well provide that eight of the nine judges or seven of the nine judges or three of the nine judges should express the judgment of the court. For that reason I say this bill is not entitled to go to any committee for consideration, because it absolutely undertakes to do that which we have no power to do and which we know just as well now as we can ever know that we have no power to do. To send it to a committee to find out that which we now know is a waste of time and is giving a dignity to this kind of proposition to which it is not entitled.

It is anarchy, pure and simple. It is the kind of anarchy that makes mobs hang men without the judgment of the law. It is the kind of anarchy that demands that the courts shall not protect the citizen in his property or his life. It is the kind of anarchy that will permit a State which has fallen into the hands of anarchists to rest safe in legislation which it may pass according to its code. The apparent purpose of the proposed legislation is to tie the hands of the Supreme Court of the United States so that it can not pass upon or set aside the vicious legislation that would result from the anarchic control of a State government. That is the purpose of it. I do not charge that it is the purpose in the mind of the Senator from Oregon. I do not know in what mind this principle originated or germinated; but if the Senator from Oregon has allowed himself to be persuaded that the proposition contained in this bill is within our power to legislate or that it is free from the criticism I have just made, then he has been imposed upon. I do not believe that it originated in the mind of the Senator from Oregon, because I have read such doctrine in papers representing the thoughts of the anarchists of the country, of men who would destroy the power of government which has been vested by the people themselves.

I have heretofore been inclined to pass it lightly by as improbable of receiving serious consideration, but when I find it presented to this body in this shape I am compelled to point out to the Senate, rather than to a committee, the evils proposed and the danger of sending such a proposition to any committee. I said on yesterday that should this go to a committee it might possibly escape without the notice of some members of the committee. It might find a lean day in the committee, when it would be taken for granted that the bill, having been introduced, must necessarily contain some merit and should be reported.

Mr. President, the proposition that vicious legislation by a State can not be corrected by the Supreme Court except by the unanimous court is bidding for a recognition of control by a minority. Whenever you say that only a unanimous decision of that court shall determine the law, you say that one man shall determine it. Let me impress that upon your minds. Whenever you say that a unanimous decision of the court is necessary, you say that one man may control the decision of the court. I am going to repeat that statement until I have the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Whenever you say that it is necessary that every judge on the bench should concur in the opinion, you say that one man on the bench shall control the opinion, because it is obvious that he may control it by refusing to concur.

Mr. President, I do not know whether or not Senators are interested in this question, but as I said in the beginning, I am either going to have the time or the attention of the Senate while I present it. It will be in the RECORD, and I may be compelled to repeat, with great frequency, these points which I deem of importance, unless I do receive the attention of the Senate when I present them.

Now, as to whether or not this bill should be permitted to go to a second reading. That objection, if urged against all bills, might create a good deal of dissatisfaction, and it might be made the medium, I will not say of revenge, but of opportunity, and the objection might be urged against all measures for reasons other than those based upon the merits of the proposition.

If the Senate of the United States will pass to a second reading a bill introduced for the purpose of depriving the Supreme Court of the United States of the judicial powers vested in it by the Constitution, then the Senate of the United States is in a bad way, that is all. There is no other purpose in this bill than to permit one man on that bench to prevent any action by the court when, forsooth, the constitutionality of a State statute is before it, or the constitutionality of an act of Congress is before it.

Now, I have objected to the second reading of this bill because I believe it is not within our province to legislate upon the subject. The bill having been read by the Senator from Oregon when he introduced it effectuated the purpose of its printing and advised the Senate of its nature and character, and no Senator can hereafter say that he did not know that it was a bill directed against the judicial power of the Supreme Court of the United States, or he would not have voted for its recognition as a legitimate subject of legislation. It is not a legitimate subject of legislation, and it should not be advanced to its second reading.

Having made that statement with as much plainness and emphasis as I am capable of, I will leave it with the Senate, the question being, Shall the bill be advanced to a second reading?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate unduly by a repetition of what I said yesterday, and if I were certain that all the Senators who are now to vote heard what I then said I would not add a word or delay the Senate in any manner.

I shall not attempt to cover fully the ground, but I wish to state the proposition in order that Senators may know the ground upon which I base my opposition to the contention of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]. I do not favor the bill offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE]. I do not believe that it is based upon correct principles. I think a majority of the Supreme Court of the United States should have the determination of questions which are submitted to it for its judgment and decision. I have no possible apprehension that a majority of the Senate will differ with me in that particular. While there are quite a number of Senators, as I believe, who will agree with the Senator from Oregon, I think the large majority of the Senate would be opposed to the passage of the bill, believing that the recognized power of the United States Supreme Court, as it has been exercised for more than a hundred years, is a power proper for it to exercise. I state thus fully what I think in regard to it in order that my position may not be misunderstood in claiming that the bill should have a second reading.

The question which is involved in this is a most serious one—the question whether or not a bill which is presented to this House shall not be permitted to go to its second reading, and that it shall be rejected by the Senate without consideration and without debate.

Mr. President, I contend that that would only be justified in a case where a bill was so utterly scandalous, so utterly inconsistent with the due respect which the Senate should have for itself, that it could not for a moment be entertained. The fact that the bill may be considered to be based on unsound principles is not sufficient; the fact that the large majority of the Senate, it may be assumed, would certainly be opposed to it is not sufficient, because at last when the Senate takes action of that kind it takes it upon the exercise of an unrestrained discretion; it takes it upon the exercise of a discretion and a judgment which can not be defined and to which there can be no limitation; and whenever it is recognized as a precedent, as an established principle, that the Senate of the United States can, in the exercise of an undefined and unlimited power, say to a Senator, "You shall not introduce a bill; or, if you introduce it, it shall not proceed to the stage where it can be discussed," you have put it within the unlimited power and discretion of a majority at any time to deny that which is essential to every free government—that is, free consideration and free discussion and free deliberation upon every proposition which may be respectfully presented to the body.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator has a question, I will; but if he wishes to answer the argument, I should prefer that he wait until I finish.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not desire to open the argument. I merely desire to suggest that my purpose in stopping it at this point was that it was one of the conditions and stages under which a bill can be most freely discussed and disposed of.

Mr. BACON. That may be true in a theoretical sense, but it is not true in practice. Bills are discussed in this body when they come back from committees, and, although, as I stated yesterday, it is sometimes the case that a Senator makes a speech on a bill when he introduces it, and again, as I stated yesterday, he might make a speech on the question of its second reading, in practice it is true that the only consideration that is given to a bill in the matter of discussion is after a bill has had its examination before a committee and has come back to the Senate upon the question of its passage.

I have endeavored to state—I put this case as strongly as I can—that I myself am entirely opposed to the bill, and my voting, as others would vote with me, against the proposition of the Senator from Idaho that the second reading shall be denied will not be put upon the ground of favoring the bill, but will be put upon the ground that it is absolutely destructive, or rather tends greatly to the destruction, of the right of a Senator to have anything which he presents to this body duly considered and debated and is a denial and a destruction of the great right of free speech and free discussion in a deliberative body such as this. The Senator from Idaho speaks of this as a matter so extreme as to justify such drastic action. I have very frequently seen matters come into this body and other deliberative bodies where upon first blush it would seem they would have no support, and yet upon consideration by a committee there has been a very great change of sentiment upon the subject. We can not draw the line. It is a dangerous innovation. It will be a most dangerous precedent to say that a majority can arrest a bill because, forsooth, they do not approve of it, before it has gone through its regular parliamentary stages. There is nothing in this bill which would justify the suggestion that it is so scandalous that the Senate should refuse to consider it. It is a bill of which I do not in any manner approve, but it is a bill which in no sense has in it any matter which can be considered scandalous. It is not considered scandalous when we pass bills, which we have done, requiring that one circuit judge, who has heretofore been charged with the power to pass upon certain questions, shall not thereafter pass upon them, but that whenever those questions arise four circuit judges shall be called in. Is that scandalous? That is simply an effort to throw an additional safeguard around the proceedings of the courts; and, however in error the pending bill may be, that is the sole purpose of this bill, and it has not any feature of scandal in it.

Now, I do not desire to detain the Senate; as I said, I expressed myself with some degree of fullness about it yesterday, and do not now desire to repeat it; but I should be extremely sorry to see the Senate, upon so little and slender a foundation, establish a precedent which in time to come, in times of great political excitement, in times of great partisan heat, might result in the utter overthrow practically of the right of free speech in the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not anticipate that the Senate is going to stop this bill, but I anticipated that I would accomplish that which I think has been accomplished, which was to call the attention of the Senate, and through the Senate the attention of the country, to the evils of this bill in order to counteract a wrong impression that might go out by reason of such a measure being received in the body.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I agree with both the Senators who have spoken on this subject this morning that this is a bad bill. It seems to me to be clearly unconstitutional, clearly unwise, and a meddling with something that is altogether beyond the power of the Senate or of the Congress.

I am not going to talk about the question whether the way to express that view is by preventing the second reading or not. I simply want to express appreciation of the service rendered by the Senator from Idaho in securing an expression upon the subject of this bill, which probably there would never be another opportunity to give, because, of course, no such bill as this will ever be reported by a committee of this Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill be read a second time?

The bill was read the second time by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

H. R. 13276. An act to provide for the disposal of the present Federal building site at Newark, Ohio, and for the purchase of a new site for such building;

H. R. 13277. An act to increase the limit of cost of the public building authorized to be constructed at Gettysburg, Pa.; and

H. R. 13391. An act to increase the cost limit of the public building at Lynchburg, Va.

FLORIDA EAST COAST RAILWAY CELEBRATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the Senate concurrent resolution 7, relative to the celebration in January, 1912, at Key West, Fla., which were, on page 1, line 18, to strike out the words "Resolved further," and, on page 2, line 4, to strike out the words "Resolved further."

Mr. ROOT. Assuming that it will be satisfactory to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

Mr. FLETCHER. It will be entirely satisfactory to me to have the Senate concur in the amendments.

The amendments were concurred in.

THE COTTON SCHEDULE.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to inquire what has become of the conference report on the free-list bill. I understand that the conferees agreed some days ago. It seems to me that we ought to have that matter before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is unable to give the Senator any information.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will ask the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. It is the purpose of the Senate conferees to make that report to the Senate this morning. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has been detained up to this time from the session of the Senate, and as he has the conferees' report it is not possible for us to submit it in his absence. It is fair to him and to my other associate on the committee to say that we did not submit it yesterday because there was already a conference report pending, and we thought it a better method of procedure to dispose of that before the other was brought before the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE entered the Chamber.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Wisconsin is here now. He can answer the question of the Senator from North Carolina, and will answer it with entire satisfaction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move to temporarily postpone the unfinished business, as I understand the conference report on the free-list bill is ready to be presented.

Mr. SMOOT. The unfinished business can be temporarily laid aside at any time when the conferees are ready to report, but it seems to me that it is proper now to take up the unfinished business. Therefore I have moved that the bill be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina move to amend the motion of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I merely suggested to the Senator from Utah that probably it would be better to have the conference report presented. I understand it is ready, and I just made that suggestion. I do not want to delay the unfinished business at all.

Mr. SMOOT. At any time the unfinished business can be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, which is House bill 12812.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is pending. The question is on agreeing to that amendment. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section to the bill, to be known as section 8.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not intend to repeat or review the argument I made on Monday in behalf of this amendment. I have understood that there are Senators who are not quite ready to vote upon the amendment, wanting to advise themselves a little further with respect to some features of it. In view of that situation, I ask the Senator from Virginia what his desires are with regard to an immediate vote upon the amendment now pending?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Iowa, I have no hesitation in saying that the minority wish to hold a conference in respect to the matters involved in these amendments and in respect to the bill, and I would not like to see a vote taken this morning. Indeed, I would be glad, as soon as the Senate disposes of the conference report, which I think will be presented in a few minutes, to have an adjournment. I should like to see the Senate adjourn, in order that we may deliberate upon these amendments before they are voted upon.

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as I am concerned, I recognize the importance of the amendment I have proposed, and I hope that Senators will be given an opportunity to fully inform themselves with regard to it. If it is the desire of the Senator from Virginia that time shall be given until to-morrow morning in order to accomplish the purpose he has in view—namely, a conference—I am entirely in favor of that plan.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask if there is any Senator who is prepared to go on and discuss the cotton bill itself; that is, the provisions of the cotton schedule. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa applies to the steel and iron schedule. If there is some Senator who is prepared to go on with the discussion of the bill I would be happy to have him do so. Then, just as soon as the conferees on the free-list bill are ready to report, I shall be glad to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business, and, at the conclusion of the speeches that may be made, I would be very glad, indeed, to adjourn until to-morrow morning before any vote is taken. If there is no objection to that program I believe it would be the best way of hastening along the business of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a few remarks to make. Does the Senator from Iowa desire to go on and discuss the bill or has he yielded the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. I took the floor because the amendment I proposed was about to be voted on, and I understood that there was a desire that it should not be voted upon at this time. I want to yield to that desire just so far as I can, and I have nothing further to suggest about it. I would be very glad to yield the floor to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am assured that the conference report on the free-list bill is being signed and that it will be presented to the Senate in a very few minutes. In the meantime the Senator from North Carolina has some remarks to submit to the Senate. When he is through and we finish with the conference report on the free-list bill, I am sure there will be no objection to an adjournment.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the program I suggested.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I desire simply to state my position on the bill that is now pending. I want to say, Mr. President, that no man can stand upon this floor and say truthfully that I have not kept faith and am not now keeping faith with the Democratic platform and its pledges from the day of Allen G. Thurman down to William J. Bryan. While I have made several dilatory motions here that seemed for delay, I want to say that I am not going to delay the passage of this bill if it is the desire of the Senate to pass it. I simply want to state my position.

This bill which is now pending before the Senate revising the cotton schedule was reported from the House of Representatives to the Senate on Friday, August 4, and referred to the Committee on Finance with instructions to report it back to the Senate not later than Thursday, August 10. On account of other important matters pending in the Senate it was impossible for the committee to meet and give hearings on Friday and Saturday, and with Sunday intervening there was left only three days for hearings on this important schedule, which affects more than $800,000,000 of cotton-mill property in this country, notwithstanding the fact that cotton manufacturers throughout the country were clamoring to be heard in their own behalf before this legislation, which might or might not seriously affect hundreds of thousands of laborers employed in their mills and possibly seriously injure this great industry which has done so much to build up our country, should be enacted into law.

The bill revising the wool schedule was reported from the House of Representatives to the Senate and referred to the Finance Committee on Wednesday, June 21, with instructions to report it back to the Senate not later than July 10. The bill was reported out of the committee on June 22, and for more than four weeks the wool bill was considered and debated upon the floor of the Senate, and now, when we are on the eve of adjournment and when it is well known to the Senate and the country that the President will veto any and all bills revising the tariff at this time, it is proposed, with "John Gilpin speed," without giving proper time for serious debate, to rush this bill through to its passage and send it to the President for his veto. All that I asked was that this bill should be given the same time and the same consideration that were given to the wool bill. I asked this and no more.

Mr. President, let the truth be told. This bill has not even a ghost of a chance to pass the Senate. The standpatters to a man will vote against it, and so will all the insurgents, and they together are a majority. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is pressing it as unfinished business, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is asking for a vote, and, strange to say, both of those Senators are opposed to the bill and will vote against it. Then, the plan is, judging from what has happened this session with other bills, for my friend, the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, to move for a reconsideration. Democrats and the insurgents will then vote together. Perhaps it will be reconsidered, when the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin will offer his bill as an amendment, and his bill, with probably the steel schedule, the sugar schedule, and maybe the chemical schedule added, will pass the Senate and be sent back to the House of Representatives. This is evidently the plan. It will be disagreed to by the House and will be sent to conference. If agreement is had and the bill is sent to the President he will probably veto it. Mr. President, I am opposed to fighting a sham battle upon a great economic question like the one now under consideration.

When I was a law student I learned from old Blackstone's Commentaries, one of the greatest law books which has ever been written, festina lente, "hasten slowly." This is the policy I would have the Senate now adopt. For one, I am willing to stay here until next June, until every tariff schedule can be reduced. But we are not going to stay here. Everybody knows that Congress will adjourn within a few days. The country is not going to the bowwows if this cotton schedule is not revised at this extra session. It does seem to me, Mr. President, the wisest policy to pursue is to let this matter go over until our regular session in December next, when we will gradually reduce this and all other schedules of the tariff—when we will not only reduce the tariff on yarns and cotton cloth, but also the tax on rubber, dyes, starch, machinery, and all other things which go into the manufacture of cotton.

Mr. President, I wish to enter my humble protest against what seems to me to be hasty and unwise legislation. If this practice of giving little or no consideration and debate to important matters of legislation is to be kept up, it seems to me that, instead of being the most deliberative body in the world, the Senate will soon degenerate into the most undeliberative body in the world. In my judgment a sufficient time can not now possibly be given for a thorough discussion of the various phases of the pending bill or for any of the amendments which have been offered to it affecting the steel schedule, the chemical and machinery schedules, and the sugar schedule.

The cotton schedule is one of the most intricate of all of the tariff schedules, and it is of the utmost importance that thorough discussion shall be had on this measure. In revising this schedule it would require that intricate and thorough knowledge of all of the divisions and subdivisions, complex and manifold mazes, and involutions of the cotton and other industries, which no committee of Congress can hope to possess at once, no matter how extended the range of their personal knowledge or how laborious and painstaking their efforts may be. We not only represent all the people, who are the many, but we represent the manufacturing interests of the country, who are the few, as well. In revising the tariff all parties and all interests should be considered, and we should only legislate upon these great subjects in such a manner as we think will help all as much as possible and at the same time do as little injury as possible to any individual or any industry in the country.

For more than two years past most of the cotton mills in the South have been running on half time; most of them have been running at a loss. They have been running only in order to give employment to their laborers, so as to keep them together and prevent them from starving. Few of the mills of the South have paid dividends in the last year or so. A good many of them have gone into the hands of receivers. Never in the history of the cotton industry have our mills been in such a depressed and deplorable condition, and never have they had so hard a time to manufacture and sell their goods at a profit as they are having to-day. Many of the mills of the South are closed down indefinitely. The closing down of the Borden Mills, at Fall River, and other great mills in the country, after serious curtailment of operations for months past, portend a serious significance for the future of the cotton industry in this country. While the industry in this country is seriously depressed, in England, Germany, and other foreign countries it has never been so prosperous as it is to-day. Our cotton manufacturers can not sell goods abroad in competition with England or Germany under present conditions; and to-day many of our manufacturers can not sell the products of their mills in our home markets at cost, but are forced to sell below cost in order to keep going.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. KERN. Do I understand the Senator to state that he believes the present condition has been brought about by the low rates of the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act?

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all. The Senator knows I would not contend that. I am in favor of lowering the Payne-Aldrich tariff in every respect. I said that at the outset.

Those who would build up rather than destroy this great industry should not only take into consideration the interests of the consumer, but they should deal with all alike in a spirit of equal justice and absolute fairness, keeping in mind at all times the interests of the laborer, the producer, and the consumer. My position is that we should free the existing taxation system from its injustices, diminish its complexities as much as possible, lighten the burden of the taxpayer, and make it contribute to our industrial prosperity, growth, and progress, keeping in view at all times as a paramount consideration the welfare of the whole country and of all our people, and that by a gradual reduction of the tariff, step by step, we can finally arrive at a revenue basis without injuring any individual or industry in the country.

This bill, as it came to us from the House of Representatives, and which has had little or no consideration before the Senate committee, and which will have little consideration in the Senate, has an average cut of 50 per cent. Upon some articles the cut is 80 per cent. It is from 17 to 20 per cent greater even than the Wilson bill. The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives said that the tariff on this schedule is reduced practically to a revenue basis. If this be true this is not a gradual reduction of the tariff in accordance with the declarations in the platforms of the Democratic Party. This is too great a step downward all at once. It is upon its face, it seems to me, a very radical reduction.

The American people have deliberately declared that the existing tariff is absolutely wrong in principle and grievously burdensome and unjust in its operations, and that it shall be revised downward. Private enterprises have been taken into partnership with the Government. Great monopolies have been organized under this power and form of taxation, and rates of taxation have been dictated by selfish and inordinate greed of those who received its benefits.

But, Mr. President, if I understand the principles and the teachings of the Democratic Party for the last quarter of a century, they have been that the high protective system which has been built up in this country is so interwoven with the whole business interests of the country that a sudden and radical reduction of the tariff to a revenue basis would produce havoc and ruin. If I understand its teaching it has been that the tariff should be revised gradually, with equal justice and fairness not only to the manufacturer, the producer, the laborer, and the consumer, but in the interests of all the people who have been struggling under the burdens of this iniquitous tariff system, by the aid of which trusts and monopolies have been built up and have robbed the people by outrageous and pernicious exactions.

In making a reduction of these taxes it should be done gradually, with a view to promoting rather than retarding the progress and growth of any of these industries so as not to injure a single domestic industry in the country doing a legitimate business. If a morphine fiend should apply to a physician for treatment and the physician should deprive him of his "dope" at once, in all probability the patient would not survive the shock; but by gradually reducing the size of the dose and increasing the intervals between doses the patient would probably be restored to his family and to society. A sudden and radical revision of the tariff to a revenue basis will, in my judgment, inevitably bring havoc and ruin to the country, whereas by reducing it gradually the manufacturers can by degrees adjust themselves to new conditions, and the interests of all the American people will be safeguarded and protected. We contend that the reductions shall be made gradually until a revenue basis is finally reached, and instead of being retarded the growth and prosperity of our industries shall be encouraged and promoted, when, under this policy our manufactured products will not be confined and restricted to our home markets, but can enter all the markets of the world and successfully compete with similar products from other countries.

At the same time that there is a reduction of the cotton schedule there should be a reduction of the machinery schedule and of all the other commodities which go into the manufacture of cotton. Take away the bounty, but when you do that also take off some of the burdens and give to our manufacturers an equal chance; and then I am not afraid but that our people can compete with the world in the manufacture of cotton. This is one of the reasons why I have asked for a reasonable time in which to consider this bill. I have not asked for delay for the purpose of defeating any revision of this schedule or any other schedule. I am not a protectionist; I never have been. I am as much in favor of the revision and the reduction of the tariff on articles named in this schedule and all other schedules as any Senator upon this floor can possibly be. All I ask is that reductions shall be gradually and not radically made; that they shall be made cautiously and critically. This is all I have contended for and all I now contend for.

To show that I am not inconsistent and that I am in perfect harmony with the Democratic Party upon the tariff, I think it proper that I should put into the RECORD just at this place what the declarations and pledges contained in the platforms of the Democratic Party have been upon the tariff question from Grover Cleveland down to the present time.

The Democratic platform of 1884, upon which we won such a glorious victory, in its reference to the tariff declared as follows:

> Knowing full well, however, that legislation affecting the operations of the people should be cautious and conservative in method, not in advance of public opinion, but responsive to its demands, the Democratic Party is pledged to revise the tariff in a spirit of fairness to all interests. But in making reductions in taxes it is not proposed to injure any domestic industries, but rather to promote their healthy growth. From the foundation of this Government taxes collected at the custom-house have been the chief source of Federal revenue. Such they must continue to be. Moreover, many industries have come to rely upon legislation for a successful continuance, so that any change of law must be regardful of the labor and capital thus involved.

That is from the national Democratic platform of 1884. It continues to get stronger along the line of the position for which I am contending, and I want you to hear, Senators, directly, what William Jennings Bryan said.

In his first annual message to Congress in December, 1885, Mr. Cleveland, speaking of the tariff, said:

> Justice and fairness dictate that in any modification of our present laws relating to revenue the industries and interests which have been encouraged by such laws and in which our citizens have large investments should not be ruthlessly injured or destroyed. We should also deal with the subject in such manner as to protect the interests of American labor, which is the capital of our workingmen.

In his second annual message to Congress in December, 1886, speaking of tariff revision, Mr. Cleveland said:

> In readjusting the burdens of Federal taxation a sound public policy requires that such of our citizens as have built up large and important industries under present conditions should not be suddenly and to their injury deprived of advantages to which they have adapted their business; but if the public good requires it they should be content with such consideration as shall deal fairly and cautiously with their interests, while the just demands of the people for relief from needless taxation is honestly answered.
> A reasonable and timely submission to such a demand should certainly be possible without disastrous shock to any interests; and a cheerful concession sometimes averts abrupt and heedless action, often the outgrowth of impatience and delayed justice.

Again, in his third annual message to Congress, in December, 1887, Mr. Cleveland, speaking upon the tariff, said:

But our present tariff laws, the vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation, ought to be at once revised and amended. These laws, as their primary and plain effect, raised the price to consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties.

It is not proposed to entirely relieve the country of this taxation. It must be extensively extended as the source of the Government's income; and in a readjustment of our tariff the interests of American labor engaged in manufacture should be carefully considered, as well as the preservation of our manufactures. It may be called protection or by any other name, but relief from the hardship and dangers of our present tariff laws should be revised with the special precaution against imperiling the existence of our manufacturing interests.

The Democratic platform of 1904 declared as follows upon the tariff:

We favor a revision and a gradual reduction—

A gradual reduction—of the tariff by the friends of the masses and for the common weal, and not by the friends of its abuses, its extortions, and its discriminations, keeping in view the ultimate end of "equality of burdens and equality of opportunities," and the constitutional purpose of raising a revenue by taxation, to wit, the support of the Federal Government in all its integrity and virility, but in simplicity.

Judge Alton B. Parker, in his address accepting the Democratic nomination for President in 1904, under this platform, speaking of the tariff, said:

While, therefore, we are unable to give assurances of relief to the people from such excessive duties that burden them, it is due to them that we state our position to be in favor of a reasonable reduction of the tariff; that we believe it is demanded by the best interests of both manufacturer and consumer, and that a wise and beneficent revision of the tariff can be accomplished as soon as both branches of Congress and an Executive in favor of it are elected, without creating that sense of uncertainty and instability that has on other occasions manifested itself.

The last Democratic platform, adopted at Denver in 1908, in its reference to the tariff declared as follows:

We favor immediate revision of the tariff by the reduction of import duties. Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products should be placed upon the free list and material reductions should be made in the tariff upon the necessities of life, especially upon articles competing with such American manufactures as are sold abroad more cheaply than at home—and gradual reductions should be made in such other schedules as may be necessary to restore the tariff to a revenue basis.

Here are the words of our great leader and the pledges that he made to the people of this country, and which we, as Democrats, all made to the people of the United States in that campaign. Listen to the words of William Jennings Bryan in his tariff speech in 1908 defining the Democratic position:

The Democratic plan does not contemplate an immediate change from one system to the other; it expressly declares that the change shall be gradual, and a gradual change is only possible where the country is satisfied with results of each step taken. We elect a Congress every two years and a President every four years, and the people can soon stop any policy if the results of that policy are not satisfactory. But we believe that the experiences the people have had with "protection for protection's sake" have led them to favor a restoration of the tariff—

by gradual steps to a revenue basis, and we are convinced that the advantages following each step will be so pronounced and that the benefits will be so universally enjoyed that there will be no pause in the progress toward the system under which the tariff will be levied for the purpose of revenue and limited to the needs of the Government.

So, Mr. President, I contend that I am in thorough accord with what Mr. Bryan has said and what the Democratic Party has said in all of our pledges to the people. In a word, Mr. President, the platform declarations and the utterances of the leaders of the party to which I belong have uniformly been in favor of a gradual revision of the tariff schedules, so as to reduce them to a revenue basis. This has been and is my understanding of the policy and the teachings of the Democratic Party with respect to tariff revision.

This bill may provide for revision upon these lines. I know that on the lower grades of yarns and cloth the South now can compete with the world without any tariff. The proposed revision in the pending bill may be a just and proper revision, but I confess I do not know—neither do a half dozen Senators upon this floor know—whether it is a wise and just reduction, for they have had no time to consider it, and we have had little or no time to make an investigation of what effect it will have upon our American industries. Practically no hearings have been had upon the bill, and those who are directly and most vitally interested in this legislation, in my opinion, have not been given sufficient time in which to come here and be heard in their own behalf. Some manufacturers say they will be ruined if this bill becomes a law. I do not know whether that is true or not; I do not know whether it is revision to a revenue basis or not; but I know what the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee has said, and if we vote for it here we vote for it on faith.

Mr. President, not having had time to consider all of the different phases of this bill or to go through all its mazes and involutions, intricacies and details, I have simply uttered my protest against the manner of proceeding with this kind of legislation and the haste with which it is proposed to pass it through the Senate. I humbly confess that my judgment is not greater than that of my colleagues who sit with me on this side of the Chamber and who seem determined to vote upon the bill at this time. I am not bigger than my party nor am I wiser than my colleagues in the party, and if they are determined that this bill shall pass at this extra session of Congress I shall vote for it, after having uttered my humble protest and after having called attention to the platform pledges of the great Democratic Party, hoping as I do that we will revise this and all other tariff schedules next winter when we convene in regular session, and that we will then give more time to parties concerned to be heard and more time for the consideration of these different schedules. But I do contend that in order that the great industries of the country may not be injured when we do revise the tariff we should reduce it according to our platform pledges, and, considering the few as well as the many, correct as far as possible the great inequalities in the tariff laws; and in so contending I think I am in thorough accord and in line with my party's platform declarations and its pledges to the people.

Mr. President, when the curtain went down on the great tragedy at Appomattox 12,500 soldiers, leaving behind them 40,000 of their dead comrades in soldiers' graves, went back to the old State, one-third of the male population of which had either been killed or had died in that terrible struggle. They went back to the State to find a vacant chair in and crape upon the doorpost of 40,000 homes. They went back to a land of desolation, where there was little left but hunger, weeping, and sorrow. They went back to find poverty and devastation on every hand, their property swept away, their house dilapidated, their fences down, and their stock gone.

But they had surrendered in good faith and they took up the plow and turned the furrows and went again to State building. Then they and their sons through the dark and horrible days of reconstruction went to work to restore that great Commonwealth; and what they have accomplished in 50 years is most wonderful to tell. The rehabilitation of that old State and the progress she has made have been most marvelous, until to-day North Carolina stands unsurpassed by any State in the Union. Besides other great industries they have built 300 cotton mills, with an investment of $100,000,000, giving employment to 50,000 native-born American citizens. They have established 85 hosiery mills, with an investment of $5,000,000, giving employment to 10,000 native-born workingmen. They have developed great water powers, and nearly every mill in the State is being run by electricity. Besides this, Mr. President, they have been loyal American citizens. When war was declared with Spain 3,000 of their sons volunteered to fight for their country. The first man killed in that war was a North Carolina boy—shot down on board the Winslow, and his bloody form, wrapped in the fold of the Stars and Stripes, was carried home to his mother, the widow of a Confederate soldier. The brave and gallant Shipp, another North Carolina boy, was shot down while gallantly leading a negro regiment to victory up San Juan Heights, and his lifeless form was carried home wrapped in the very colors against which his own father had fought a little over a quarter of a century before.

Mr. President, if I am out of line with my party and it is a sin for me to stand here and ask that these men, who have contributed so largely to the industrial development and prosperity of my State, be given a reasonable time in which to be heard upon matters vitally affecting their own interests and the interests of 60,000 wage earners and workingmen they employ, then I am a sinner and I plead guilty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question pending before the Senate is upon the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the so-called cotton bill.

THE FREE LIST.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 6, and agree to the same.

On the amendments of the Senate numbered 5 and 7 and the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
J. W. BAILEY,
F. M. SIMMONS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

O. W. UNDERWOOD,
C. B. RANDELL,
FRANCIS BURTON HARRISON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I also submit a statement of the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the Senate at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements etc., submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying report:

On amendment No. 1: Places binders on the free list, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 2: Strikes out of the bill the provision proposed by the House limiting the application of the bill to boots and shoes of certain constituent parts only.

On amendments Nos. 3, 4, and 6: Makes verbal corrections in the text of the bill.

On the amendments of the Senate Nos. 5 and 7 and the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 8, the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
J. W. BAILEY,
F. M. SIMMONS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move the adoption of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments Nos. 5 and 7 to the bill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and further insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 8, and ask a further conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent to add after the word "corn" the words "not for distillation," so that the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin will treat it in that form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that the words "not for distillation" be inserted after the word "corn." Is there objection?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not understand that.

Mr. BAILEY. The explanation is simply this: In the agreement with Canada corn is admitted free only when it is not for distillation, and I simply seek to conform this bill to that agreement. Canada imports some 6,000,000 bushels of corn, much of it for distillation.

Mr. BACON. I do not understand the exact motion of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not make a motion, because I think a motion would not be in order. I think the Senate could not insist upon its own amendment with an amendment, and I sought to reach it merely by unanimous consent. If there is in the mind of any Senator any question about the propriety of that request, I freely admit it to be irregular and will withdraw it.

Mr. BACON. I have no objection to the purpose which the Senator has in view, but I do very gravely doubt the regularity of the proceeding.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, there is no difference, so far as the exercise of the power of the Senate is concerned, between that which is done by a majority and that which is done by unanimous consent. The question is whether the Senate can do it at all or not. It is not a question whether it can do it by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the Senate could do it, and I think the House could then agree to the amendment. But it is of such doubtful propriety that unless it was freely assented to by all Senators I would not want it done at all; and I withdraw the request and allow the question to come on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. PENROSE, Mr. CULLOM, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. BAILEY, and Mr. SIMMONS.

ST. CROIX RIVER BRIDGE, WISCONSIN–MINNESOTA.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11723) permitting the building of a railroad bridge across the St. Croix River between Burnett County, Wis., and Pine County, Minn.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS BIG SANDY RIVER, W. VA.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 4682) authorizing the construction of a bridge, and approaches thereto, across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River at or near Glenhayes Station, in Wayne County, W. Va.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

METROPOLITAN COACH CO., DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2904) to confer upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia authority to regulate the operation and equipment of the vehicles of the Metropolitan Coach Co.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 2, line 6, to strike out all of section 3 and to insert a new section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. That said company shall provide and furnish at all times such service and facilities as shall be reasonably safe and adequate; and it shall at all times maintain its vehicles in good and proper repair, neat and clean, free from offensive smoke, noise, and odors, in a sanitary condition, sufficient in number, and reasonably comfortable and convenient. The company shall operate its vehicles over a route or routes approved by the commissioners, or to be approved by them so as to give expeditious passage to all persons desiring to use the same, and on such time schedule or schedules and for such rates and charges as said commissioners may from time to time fix and determine. The said commissioners shall have power by a rule or rules from time to time to require and compel obedience to the provisions of this section after notice to and opportunity given said company to be heard.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 14, after the word "information," to strike out "of said commissioners filed in the police court of the District of Columbia by or on behalf of said commissioners" and insert "in the name of the District of Columbia, filed in the police court of the District of Columbia by the corporation counsel or one of his assistants," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That said Metropolitan Coach Co. and its officers and employees are hereby required to obey all the provisions of this act and such reasonable rules, regulations, and orders as may be made by said commissioners, and if said company or its officers or employees violate any provision of this act or any of said rules, regulations, or orders made by said commissioners, or permit such violation, said company or each of said officers or employees shall be punished by a fine of not more than $100, and prosecution for each of said violations shall be made on information in the name of the District of Columbia, filed in the police court of the District of Columbia by the corporation counsel or one of his assistants.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 19, to strike out all of section 5 and to insert a new section 5, as follows:

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall be effective on and after the 1st day of January, 1912, and, in addition to the penalties in this act provided, the failure of the Metropolitan Coach Co. at any time or times hereafter to comply with the terms hereof shall make it unlawful for it to operate its vehicles over its route, and if said company shall, within a period of 30 days of notice thereof, fail to comply with any of said rules, regulations, or orders, made by said commissioners, its right to operate said vehicles shall terminate without notice, and the commissioners are directed thereupon to prevent the use of the public highways by said company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS ROCK RIVER, ILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 8146) to construct a bridge across Rock River at or near Colona Ferry, in the State of Illinois.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if there is no further business of an urgent character before the Senate and no Senator desires to call up any measure, I move that the Senate take a recess until 4 o'clock this afternoon.

I should like to inquire first whether the action of the Senate on the free-list bill has been sent to the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is ready to go. It has been signed and will go.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that it be sent immediately.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be sent at once.

Mr. PENROSE. In order that the Senate may act finally upon the free-list bill to-day and that it may be sent to the President, I will ask that the Senate remain in session; and as there appears to be nothing before the Senate, I move that it take a recess until 4 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 1 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 4 o'clock p. m.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The Senate reassembled at 4 o'clock p. m.

PRINTING OF VETO MESSAGE—NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the President's message, delivered to the House, on the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, be printed as a document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that the President's message to the House on House joint resolution No. 14 be printed as a Senate document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order therefor is entered.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask for a call of the Senate for a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that the Secretary be directed to call the names of the absentees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the list of absent Senators.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, August 17, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, imbue us plenteously with the spirit of righteousness, that with patience, courage, and fortitude we may fulfill to the uttermost the obligations resting upon us now and always; that when we reach the end of the King's highway we may hear the words, "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." And everlasting praise we will give unto Thee, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 1785. An act to amend section 647, chapter 18, Code of Law for the District of Columbia, relating to annual statements of insurance companies; and

S. 3052. An act granting leave of absence to certain homesteaders.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 3052. An act granting leave of absence to certain homesteaders;

S. 1785. An act to amend section 647, chapter 18, Code of Law for the District of Columbia, relating to annual statements of insurance companies; and

S. 306. An act to confirm the name of Commodore Barney Circle for the circle located at the eastern end of Pennsylvania Avenue SE., in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 11019. An act to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

WITHDRAWAL OF HOUSE RESOLUTION 258.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to withdraw House resolution 258, asking information of the War Department concerning the completion of the Florida East Coast Railway. It has served its purpose, and there is no need of it further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to withdraw House resolution 258. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

IMPROVEMENT OF BLACK WARRIOR RIVER, ALA.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the bill (S. 943) for the improvement of the Black Warrior River.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate bill 943.

The SPEAKER. The House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole automatically.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Before going into committee, Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent that general debate on that bill may be limited to two hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN], pending the automatic going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, asks unanimous consent that general debate on the bill (S. 943) for the improvement of the Black Warrior River be confined to two hours.

Mr. SPARKMAN. To be controlled one half by myself and the other half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. The time to be controlled one half by the gentleman from Florida and the other half by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know whether the gentleman desires or intends to include in this request that the debate be confined to the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida did not make any such request.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I include that in the request.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman now includes that in his request.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the gentleman that I would like to have about 20 minutes on that bill. I desire to talk on a subject other than the bill, and I hope he will modify his request so that I can have that much time on general debate.

Mr. MANN. That could probably be done only by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that. Does the gentleman request an extra 20 minutes?

Mr. NORRIS. If the gentleman thinks that much time is required for the discussion of the bill, I will ask the gentleman if he will not include in his request that 20 minutes extra time may be given to me for the discussion of another subject.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, what subject does the gentleman from Nebraska wish to discuss?

Mr. SPARKMAN. What was the request of the gentleman from Nebraska in reference to that debate?

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman is that he may have 20 minutes extra, so that he may discuss some other question. What does the gentleman from Florida say about that?

Mr. MANN. What is the subject that the gentleman from Nebraska wishes to talk about?

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to talk about reciprocity.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think two hours is all we ought to give to the general debate. There are other matters to come up.

The SPEAKER. As the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] seems to object to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska, the Chair will put the request of the gentleman from Florida. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to two hours, one half of it to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Florida if he refuses to include the modification that I requested?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I could not allow 20 minutes to be taken out of the time on this side for any other discussion than matters pertaining to the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not hear the gentleman. Does he object to modifying the request as desired by me?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; I will have to object to that.

Mr. NORRIS. I will return good for evil, then, and not object to the gentleman's request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. STERLING, indefinitely, on account of the death of a relative.

BLACK WARRIOR RIVER.

Under the rule the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 943) to improve navigation on Black Warrior River, in the State of Alabama, with Mr. FERRIS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Under an order that has been agreed to by unanimous consent, general debate has been limited to two hours, to be equally divided between the respective sides, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] controlling one hour and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] controlling the other.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I will try not to occupy the entire time yielded to me by the gentleman from Florida, and hope I will not be interrupted for 30 minutes. After that time I will be glad to answer all questions.

The purpose of the bill is to improve navigation on the Black Warrior River, and at the same time to preserve, if possible, water power that might be developed at Locks and Dams 16 and 17. Under present plans it is proposed to construct five low dams, beginning with Dam 17, in order to complete slack-water navigation to the point fixed by the engineers for navigation in that river at this time.

The engineers, in their last report upon the subject, say:

> The board considers the plan for a 63-foot lift at Dam 17 to be the most favorable one that has been considered, and it recommends that it be adopted, subject to action of Congress on the Senate bill above referred to (S. 943).

After careful investigation they approve a 63-foot lift at Dam 17 instead of a 21-foot lift. This calls for no more money than would be required to construct five low locks in the improvement of navigation up to the same point, to wit, below Saunders Shoals. On the contrary, it will require less. It will cost something in the neighborhood of $1,000,000 less in the long run, when cost of maintenance is considered, to raise the dam at 17 to a 63-foot lift and flood the other locks than it would cost to build all of the five locks with low lifts.

At this point comes in the proposition of water power. There is no expectation of developing water power in the Warrior River if five low locks are to be constructed. The proposition to raise Dam 17 to 63 feet called the attention of the engineers to the development of power in the Black Warrior River. It meets the approval of the engineers and of the Senators and Members of Congress from Alabama that water power should be developed at Dams 16 and 17.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman submit to an interruption?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I can not at this time, but will do so a little later. Now, how is the water power to be developed at Lock 17? By whom is it to be developed? There are four agencies that can develop this water power—the General Government, the State of Alabama, individuals in their individual capacity, and a power company or corporation authorized by law to do it.

It matters not who undertakes the development of water power, it must pay the price. To develop power at Dam 17 will require, in addition to what is necessary to raise the dam to 63 feet height for navigation, the spending of a million and a half dollars or more, without considering the cost of flowage rights, estimated at $150,000. In other words, it will take $1,650,000 to develop power after the dam has been raised and built for the purpose of navigation.

Who is to pay this $1,650,000? One of the four agencies—the General Government, the State government, private individuals who have riparian rights, or a corporation authorized by law to do so. The General Government has never gone into the business of creating water power except for Government use around the locks where it is to be developed. So the General Government need not be considered. Individually I would be glad if the General Government would undertake to develop power at Lock 17, but am satisfied it will not do so.

The State of Alabama has not the power to do it by its own constitution. Its constitution in this respect is substantially like the constitutions of Pennsylvania, Minnesota, Michigan, Kentucky, Ohio, Illinois, Maryland, and a number of other States. Under the constitution of the State of Alabama the State is not permitted to engage in or lend its aid or credit to internal improvements. A like inhibition exists as to counties, municipalities, and other subdivisions, as will appear in sections 93 and 94 of the constitution of Alabama, which will be inserted in my remarks.

Sections 93 and 94 of the constitution of Alabama read as follows:

> SEC. 93. The State shall not engage in works of internal improvement, nor lend money or its credit in aid of such; nor shall the State be interested in any private or corporate enterprise, or lend money or its credit to any individual, association, or corporation.
> SEC. 94. The legislature shall not have power to authorize any county, city, town, or other subdivision of this State to lend its credit, or to grant public money or thing of value in aid of, or to any individual, association, or corporation whatsoever, or to become a stockholder in any such corporation, association, or company by issuing bonds or otherwise.

See the case of Horace M. Oren, Attorney General ex rel George H. Barbour et al. v. Hagen S. Pingree et al. (46 L. R. A., 407).

This is a very able opinion, in which the court gives the history of internal improvements by States following the War of 1812, and the changes in the constitutions of many of the States most disastrously affected.

The words "internal improvements" do not appear in all the constitutions, but they do appear in the constitution of Michigan of 1850, and have been construed by the Michigan court. So that the State of Alabama is not authorized to develop water power at Dam 17, and the United States Government does not propose to do it. Then who must do it, if it is done? Either some private individual or a corporation.

I doubt if any Member of this House could find a private individual who would invest $1,500,000 or $2,000,000 in a water-power proposition of any kind, anywhere. The State of Alabama has provided for water-power development by a general law for the organization of power companies. Alabama has provided in its constitution and laws for the organization of corporations, with special provisions as to power companies. The constitution and sections of the code relating thereto will be inserted in my remarks and are as follows.

Sections 229, 231, 233, and 234 of the constitution of Alabama, on corporations, read as follows:

> SEC. 229. The legislature shall pass no special act conferring corporate powers, but it shall pass general laws under which corporations may be organized and corporate powers obtained, subject, nevertheless, to repeal at the will of the legislature; and shall pass general laws under which charters may be altered or amended. The legislature shall, by general law, provide for the payment to the State of Alabama of a franchise tax by corporations organized under the laws of this State, which shall be in proportion to the amount of the capital stock; but strictly benevolent, educational, or religious corporations shall not be required to pay such a tax. The charter of any corporation shall be subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal under general laws.

SEC. 231. The legislature shall not remit the forfeiture of the charter of any corporation now existing or alter or amend the same, nor pass any general or special law for the benefit of such corporation, other than in execution of a trust created by law or by contract, except upon condition that such corporation shall thereafter hold its charter subject to the provisions of this constitution.

SEC. 233. No corporation shall engage in any business other than that expressly authorized in its charter or articles of incorporation.

SEC. 234. No corporation shall issue stocks or bonds except for money, labor done, or property actually received; and all fictitious increase of stock or indebtedness shall be void. The stock and bonded indebtedness of corporations shall not be increased except in pursuance of general laws, nor without the consent of persons holding the larger amount in value of stock, first obtained at a meeting to be held after 30 days' notice, given in pursuance of law.

Sections in Code of Alabama, 1907, for organizing corporations:

SEC. 3445. How to incorporate: Three or more persons may become a body corporate for the purpose of carrying on any lawful business or businesses of any kind or nature whatsoever upon making and filing a certificate pursuant to the provisions of this article.

SEC. 3446. Certificate, contents of:

1. Name of corporation.
2. Object.
3. Location.
4. Capital stock: The amount of the total authorized capital stock, which shall not be less than $2,000; the number of shares into which the same is divided; the amount of capital stock with which it will begin business, which shall not be less than 25 per cent of the authorized capital and in no case less than $1,000; but if the corporation is formed for the purpose of carrying on the business of banking or that of a trust company, the amount of capital stock with which it will begin business shall in no case be less than $25,000; or if the corporation is formed for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance in any of its branches, or of any kind or nature whatsoever, except title guaranty companies, the amount of capital stock with which it will begin business shall in no case be less than $100,000. If there be more than one class of stock created by the certificate, there shall also be stated a description of the different classes of stock, with the term of which each class is created.
5. Officer to receive subscription.
6. Incorporators and shares.
7. Time limit: The period, if any, limited for the duration of the corporation.
8. Special requirements.
9. For public or municipal works.
10. Special provisions.

SEC. 3454. When a body corporate: When the certificate has been made, recorded, and filed as provided, the incorporators, their successors and assigns, shall constitute a body corporate under the name set forth in the certificate, but subject to dissolution as provided for in this code.

SEC. 3455. Statement to be filed with the secretary of state.

SEC. 3467. Capital stock; how paid: All subscriptions to or for the capital stock of the corporation must be payable in money, but may, except as otherwise provided in this article, be discharged by the rendition of stipulated necessary services or the performance of stipulated necessary labor, or the transfer of property, at the reasonable value thereof, but in such cases the subscription list shall state the names of the subscribers who are privileged to discharge their subscriptions in services or labor or property, and the nature and character of the services of labor in which the same are rendered or performed, and the character and a brief description of such property, and when it is to be transferred to the company.

SEC. 3481. General powers of corporations: Every corporation organized under article 1 of this chapter shall have the following powers:

(1) Time limit: To have succession by its corporate name for the period limited in the certificate of incorporation, and when no period is limited, perpetually; except that corporations formed for the purpose of carrying on the business of banking shall not be extended beyond 20 years from the date of their organization, unless renewed or extended as in this chapter provided.

SPECIAL PROVISIONS AS TO POWER COMPANIES.

SEC. 3634. Authority to erect dams: Any dam erected in accordance with the provisions of this statute shall be considered a dam authorized by the legislature of this State at the particular site selected and of the specific height and dimensions determined upon.

SEC. 3635. Shall have powers conferred upon other public-service corporations: Such corporations and public-utility corporations shall have and exercise all the rights, powers, and privileges now and hereafter conferred upon public-utility corporations.

SEC. 3636. Duty to serve the public: Any corporation which exercises any of the rights conferred by this article shall, after the completion of its works and plants, be under the duty and obligation to the public to manufacture and sell to the public electric current produced at its plants, and any corporation manufacturing, selling, and supplying power, heat, light, or electricity produced by water as a motive force under the provisions of this article, must sell such power, heat, light, or electricity to any person or persons, municipal or other corporations, in the order in which requests or demands are made for such light, heat, power, or electricity. Nothing herein, however, shall be construed to require any such corporation to furnish light, heat, power, or electricity to any person or persons, corporation or corporations, until satisfied of his or its financial responsibility, and except in conformity with its reasonable rules and regulations and reasonable prices for the same, and except as far as the capacity of its plant will permit.

The constitution and laws of the State of Alabama in regard to corporations I submit are quite similar to the constitution and laws in Ohio, only better in many respects. To meet conditions that are now arising the laws of the State of Alabama are better than the laws of the States that have older constitutions. Still the same course has to be pursued to organize a corporation in the State of Alabama that is pursued in the State of Ohio. The certificate issued by the secretary of state of the organization of a corporation does not give the name of the president nor of any of its officers. It is not considered of any importance. The granting of the charter by the State under its general law gives character to the corporation in Alabama or elsewhere, and offers sufficient guaranty that the rights of the public will be protected. I was asked on the floor of the House the other day to give the names of the officers of this corporation, and I did not know their names. The certificate of its charter from the secretary of state is now in my hand, and is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Montgomery, Ala.

I, Cyrus B. Brown, secretary of state in and for the State of Alabama, do hereby certify that there has been filed in this office report of incorporation through the probate court of Walker County, Ala., of the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co. (Inc.), under date of July 17, 1909, with an authorized capital stock of $20,000 and capital stock actually paid in of $20,000, and that said report is in full compliance with the statutes of this State.

I further certify that the said Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co. (Inc.) has filed in this office a copy of plans for the construction of a dam or system of dams and a lock or system of locks, and certified copy of its articles of incorporation, as required by section 6148 of the Code of Alabama, 1907.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of State, at the capitol, in the city of Montgomery, this the 12th day of August, 1911.

[SEAL.] CYRUS B. BROWN,
Secretary of State.

I will insert it in the RECORD, but will not take time to read it. The names of the officers do not appear in this certificate. I have learned the name of the president of the corporation, but not much of his history. His name is T. H. Friel. His father was an Irishman, who came to this country as a stonemason and settled near Birmingham, Ala., in Jefferson County, where the son was born. This corporation was organized in 1909 for the distinct purpose of developing water power. Under the laws of Alabama you can not have a special charter for corporations any more than you can in Ohio. They must be organized under the general law, as they ought to be. It is organized under the general laws of Alabama, under which, so far as power companies are concerned, the State has authority to establish rates or "reasonable prices" that are to be paid by consumers. So that when this corporation was organized by the State of Alabama to go into the business of developing, using, and selling water power, embedded in its articles of incorporation was the principle that it must serve the public and "must sell such power, heat, light, or electricity to any person or persons, municipal or other corporations, in the order in which requests or demands are made, and charge reasonable prices for the same." It is unobjectionable to me to add an amendment, if you think it improves it, to confer like authority upon the Secretary of War. That such amendment will improve the bill, I can not agree. And why? Because it will confer the power to fix rates on two jurisdictions—one the Secretary of War and the other the State of Alabama.

Still, I have no objection. If it be an improvement, I would like to see it put in, and welcome all amendments that look in the direction of improving the bill—

> Whoe'er expects a perfect bill to see,
> Expects what never was, nor is, nor e'er shall be—especially if it has to pass under the censorship of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and this bill is not perfect. No one claims it is perfect. There are in the hands of the chairman of the committee amendments to meet every suggestion made on this floor looking to improvement of the provisions of that bill along broad lines, and whatever other proper amendments are suggested, as they are suggested, if I have the opportunity, will be readily accepted. If in my judgment an amendment offered does not improve the bill, then let the House test it, and when the House says by its vote it is an improvement, I will be satisfied, provided it does not go so far as to make the contract impossible of execution by laying too heavy a hand upon a citizen of Alabama who has organized a corporation for the purposes of developing water power in Alabama under the general laws of the State. He has not $3,000,000, as I understand, nor has the corporation $3,000,000, nor the hundredth part of it. It expects to bond its property and rights that it may acquire under this bill, if it gets the rights to develop that water power, with capitalists who have the money. I admitted here the other day, and I admit it again, Alabama has as many and valuable natural resources as any State in the Union: It is equally true it has not the capital or money in its own territory to develop its natural resources.

I will illustrate. The United States Government needed brains in Panama; brains first to meet disease and stamp it out and make it healthful. They called for a doctor. Alabama responded with one of her natural resources and offered Dr. William C. Gorgas, and the Isthmus is free from disease to-day. He was one of Alabama's natural resources. The State of Alabama had another natural resource, a young man who did not have the means at home for development, nor did his parents, and he was taken to West Point and educated there. The capital was furnished by the United States Government, and when it wanted to build Gatun Dam, the greatest engineering project ever dreamed of, they detailed for that great work Lieut. Col. William L. Sibert, a natural resource from the State of Alabama [applause], developed and cultivated by capital furnished by the Government of the United States.

What has been the practice of this Government in regard to power? What are the precedents? I will start with the State of New York. At Niagara Falls, the water power of which is a natural resource, not a dollar was spent by the State of New York, not a dollar was paid to the United States by a corporation organized in the State of New York for the purpose of utilizing that power, and they get 160,000 horsepower a year without a dollar rental for it—a natural resource. So in the Tennessee River at Hales Bar the Government authorized the erection of a dam there by a company under similar conditions which now obtain in this bill, and they authorized the development of power there without a dollar charge in rentals and with a time limit of 99 years. Ninety-nine years is the time limit, and not one dollar charged for rent of horsepower. In Kentucky, that splendid, that grand old State, in which every human being feels an interest and in which every American finds a home, has the same law in regard to corporations almost that Alabama has, and has similar provisions in its constitution in regard to internal improvements, thereby forcing internal improvements such as this to be done by corporations, if done at all—this great State asked and received from the General Government authority for one of its corporations to erect a dam in the Cumberland River and a lock with that dam, and the corporation authorized to charge toll for navigation through that lock for a period of 40 years, and the power was given to it forever without a dollar expended in the payment of rents or any other charge or revenue to the United States.

The last river and harbor bill authorized on the Coosa River in Alabama a power company to develop power and pay to the General Government $1 a horsepower for its use. A few years before on the Coosa River the Government authorized power to be developed there with no charge whatever and no regulation of the rate to consumers. Up to date the Government has developed power throughout many States, all at its own expense, and they sell that power at from 65 cents to $2.85 a horsepower and in all these numberless propositions the amount received by the Government up to this time is $5,600 a year. This bill proposes for a small corporation in Alabama to pay the Government $15,000 a year when the Government does not expend a dollar beyond the cost of navigation improvement toward the development of the power, which is three times as much rental as the Government has ever received from all power developments in the United States up to this time. The proposition in the bill is a plain, practical business proposition. There are two points on this river at which power is to be developed. One is at Lock 17, which the Government owns. It owns the land; it is the riparian proprietor. It is the Government of the United States which controls commerce and navigation and proposes now to build a dam for navigation and for commerce that will not develop a pound of power, not a foot of it—unless the foundations of the dam are prepared now for power development—but requires a dam 63 feet high in order to float the boats that pass along up and down that river. There is another dam to be constructed and power to be developed 50 or 60 miles above with which the United States Government has nothing to do. The land there is owned on both sides of the river by this power company, organized under the laws of Alabama for the special purpose of developing water power on its property and under its rights as riparian owner.

I have in my hand a partial list of projects already enacted where power has been developed in connection with navigation and where water has been developed for irrigation purposes and the rights have been conferred on corporations, together with a memorandum furnished to me August 11 from the Engineer Office and a memorandum from the said office dated June 11, 1911, which I desire to insert in the RECORD.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, August 11, 1911.

(Memorandum of Hon. GEORGE W. TAYLOR.)

1. The rental received for horsepower per year in the case of the Muskingum River dams varies from $0.61 to $2.85. The calculations upon which these figures are based are made with the assumption that the lift of the dam is the maximum possible. As a matter of fact, the horsepower which can be generated varies at each location as the fall over the dam varies, at high water stages the dams being drowned out and no power being available.

2. The amounts above referred to are itemized as follows in the case of the Muskingum River:

Dam No.	Locality.	Amount.	Rental per horsepower per year.
1	Marietta	182	$1.65
2	Devols	178	.61
3	Lowell	321	.88
4	Beverly	305	1.06
6	Stockport	166	1.59
7	McConnellsville	264	1.21
10	Zanesville	681	2.85
		704	2.24

These leases are made after bids have been publicly invited.

3. On the Green River power is leased at Dam No. 2, located at Rumsey, for $3.75 and $4.40 per horsepower.

4. In many of the above-mentioned cases the leases include certain property owned by the Government to be used by the lessee for mill sites, etc., so that the above-stated rates are to be considered as including a charge for the lease of the property as well as a charge for the right to use the power.

5. The following is quoted from a letter dated August 1, addressed to the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House of Representatives by the Acting Chief of Engineers:

"In considering the rate of charge and the time-element features of this bill the department has been governed somewhat by a consideration of the facts that it is undoubtedly to the interest of the Government and of the country that the water power be developed; that the development is located in the heart of a coal region where steam power is cheaply produced; that the Government will obtain a suitable improvement for navigation more cheaply in the long run if the improvement is combined with water-power development; and that if the terms of the cooperation are made too onerous the company might refuse to enter into contract, the Government thus losing the advantage of decreased ultimate cost, and the water power being perpetually wasted. A telegram received from Maj. Flagler relative to the rate of charge provided in this case states: 'One-dollar rental horsepower, my letter May 3, is believed to be high, and is based on price stated in bill and apparently satisfactory to power company. One dollar capitalized at 5 per cent represents $20, increase on first cost of installation of power plant per horsepower over free water power, which I consider high for available horsepower and construction costs on Black Warrior, as determined by me. Power company's estimates are doubtful as to market price of power developed and amount available dollar price is based on assumption that all additional costs power installation are borne by company.' At the expiration of the periods stated in the bill it will be possible to make a more exact determination of the rate which should be charged, since the construction costs, sale prices, and amounts of power developed will then be definitely known."

6. In the cases above referred to, the expenditures required to develop the water power have all been made by the Government, whereas in the proposed development on the Black Warrior the amount of the water power is greatly increased by the regulation of flow which will be obtained by the operation of the storage dam proposed to be constructed by the power company; and that company expects also to construct that portion of the dam at No. 17 which will constitute the foundations for its power house. It expects also to pay the cost of all flowage rights over all lands to be flooded by the dam. In the case of the Muskingum River dams and other dams at which horsepower has been developed and sold by the Government, such expenditures have been made by the Government alone. This last statement does not apply to the dams now under construction at Hales Bar, Tennessee River, and at Keokuk, Mississippi River, since in those two cases all expenditures are made by the power companies, and no charge is imposed for the use of power.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, June 22, 1911.

(Memorandum concerning water-power leases under War Department.)

1. Under special provisions of the act of Congress of 31st of July, 1888 (p. 507, laws of the United States, improvement of rivers and harbors), the act of 19th of September, 1890 (p. 572, same publication), the act of 13th and 28th of June, 1902 (pp. 987 and 1024, same publication), and under special cession by the State of Kentucky to the United States, 24th of January, 1880, the War Department is at present leasing water power in about 39 places in connection with 7 dams on the Muskingum River, Ohio; 2 dams on the Green River, Ky.; 1 dam on the Barren River, Ky.; and 1 dam on the Kentucky River, Ky., with a right to make leases on 1 dam on the Cumberland River, Ky., the total gross revenue thus received by the Government being about $5,600. These acts in general authorized the Secretary of War to fix a time limit not exceeding 20 years and a rate and other such conditions as may seem to him expedient, the lease to cover the use of surplus water not required for navigation in such way as not to interfere with navigation; then on the Muskingum, Green, and Barren the Secretary of War is also authorized to lease mill sites under much similar conditions; all moneys received from these leases to be turned in to the Treasury of the United States semiannually or annually, and an itemized statement of the same to accompany the annual report of the Chief of Engineers (the statements for the year 1910 are found on pp. 1984, 2004, and 2041, Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers.)

Not only that, but I will say to those gentlemen who fear the possibility of watered stock that the constitution of the State and the laws of the State do not wait for a corporation to water its stock in order to squeeze the water out. They require corporations to be organized in such shape that no water can get in. No bond can be issued, no stock can be issued, that is not paid for with money or labor or property actually paid in at a fair valuation. And that is the case with this proposition.

The situation is simply this: The Government wants to develop power at Lock and Dam No. 17, and ought to do it, with the best contract that it can make. What do its engineers say? They say the best you can do, unless it is increased from the storage dam above the point of navigation as now fixed by the engineers, is to generate not over 900 primary horsepower at Lock 17 by the normal flow of the river.

Suppose the Government wants to lease or sell this power? It can only lease or sell it at Locks and Dams Nos. 16 and 17, and the engineers say that the maximum, with the regular flow of the river unaided by the storage dam to be erected by this company, will only make 900 primary horsepower. What sort of a contract could you make under those circumstances? The contract prepared by your committee in connection with this company on such dam requires that the company shall pay on the minimum basis of 15,000 horsepower a rental of $1 a horsepower, or $15,000 a year on what Government engineers say can not produce that amount of power. Put that up to a bidder and what would you get for it? Would you get as much as $15,000 per annum? Of course not.

You can only get that rental from the company that owns the right to develop power at the point where the engineers say, if it is ever developed beyond what they expect, must come from the storage dam at Sanders Shoals. The engineers employed by the company had higher expectations, and that was why your committee requires the company to come up to 15,000 as a minimum basis. The Senate bill as it came to our committee required $10,000 per annum. We require 15,000 horsepower as a minimum to be paid for, making $15,000 rental per annum for the first 20 years. That accounts for these figures. The engineers representing this corporation think they could more than double the development that the engineers of the Army estimate for, and we thought it our duty to make the company pay according to what they expected to get, and we did it. You could not get such a contract as that by putting the matter up to the highest bidder for power at Lock 17.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. With pleasure.

Mr. MADDEN. They do make a statement that it is possible to get 25,000 horsepower in some seasons of the year, do they not?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. No; I think not.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought that statement was made by the engineers.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I never saw it.

Mr. MADDEN. I will ask the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] if they did not state it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is in stages of high water.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. That is in stages of high water, which are occasional and last two or three weeks, and I do not know whether you could negotiate a business proposition to meet that situation or not; that is, in time of freshets. But that would not in any sense be primary power, and I am speaking now of primary power.

In answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] the other day, I stated that 30,000 horsepower was expected to be developed. I find that was misunderstood. I meant at both dams, not alone at Dam 17, but at the storage of the company at Sanders Shoals included; and only half of that would be primary power, which would make about 7,500 at the locks and 7,500 at the storage dam. But if they produce 100,000 horsepower, as the gentleman seems to expect, under this bill they would have to pay on the 100,000 that was produced. The $15,000 annual rental required under the bill is merely the minimum charge to be made.

Mr. AMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. With great pleasure.

Mr. AMES. Is not this proposition, stripped to its smallest expression, this: To prevent water power that may be developed at the Government dam coming in connection with water power that may be developed by the company?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I think not. On the contrary my view is and the facts are that the water-power company finding out that their dam above was insufficient as a paying investment, looked into the river below and discovered the possibility of developing at Dam 17 power enough in conjunction with that to be developed at their storage dam to make a paying investment. The company gave the result of their investigation to the War Department, and urged the engineers to adopt the 63-foot lift at Dam 17 in order to secure water power on the Black Warrior River. The company sought naturally to obtain the benefit of their discovery or suggestion for the development of power at this point.

Mr. AMES. Suppose your Alabama corporation, organized under the laws of the State, in developing water power above navigable waters, does not have control of the power that might be developed at this Government Lock 17 if it were built to a height of sixty-odd feet, do you suppose the Alabama company could compete for a minute with water power developed there in real competition?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. There will be no water power developed at Dam 17 unless by some corporation—this company or some other. There is no intention on the part of the Government at its own expense to develop water power there at all. If the water power is not developed by this corporation or some other, it will never be developed.

Mr. AMES. I say, if it should be, could the corporation compete?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I am inclined to think it would drive the company out of business. The Government has always been just, and I believe it always will be just and will never take away from anybody or anything a right that equitably belongs to it, not even the equity of discovery or suggestion.

Mr. AMES. But if the Government builds one dam instead of two or three and increases the head from a few feet up to 60-odd feet the water power can be developed there if a provision is put in to utilize it?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. That could be done, and is exactly what this bill proposes should be done.

Mr. AMES. You have a head of water and a quantity of water, have you not?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. AMES. And unless this corporation has the controlling interest for a number of years—you propose to make it 50—in the power to be developed at this Government dam, how could they afford to put their money into a dam above navigable water and enter into competition with a Government dam?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Because they have the power to control, over and above the normal flow of the river, by the erection of their dam, so much more power than the Government could develop at that lock that they would still be in position to control by reason of their storage dam.

Mr. AMES. The gentleman seems not to follow me. Is it not true that the Government can build either one dam or three dams?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. AMES. Suppose the Government built one dam?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Then you can develop power.

Mr. AMES. Then you can develop power; yes. There is no reason why the Government should not do that instead of building three dams?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Oh, yes; the Government ought not to put three dams or more in a river when it knows beforehand that it is going to put all water power to sleep in that river.

Mr. AMES. That is what I say: Build one dam instead of three dams.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. That is exactly what I have been endeavoring to say.

Mr. AMES. If the Government builds that one dam, then power can be developed there?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. AMES. If the Alabama corporation builds farther up the river they will have to compete with the Government dam? They will have to compete, or do you propose to give to them?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. We propose to sell it to them, not to give it—to let the company spend the large amount of money necessary for a power and to pay rent for it.

Mr. AMES. So that this thing resolves itself into this proposition: That the Alabama company, in order to safely invest its funds, must have a controlling interest for at least 50 years, as you provide, in the possibility of water power developed at the Government dam.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. No; not a controlling interest, but an absolute interest for 50 years, in consideration of the money invested and of flowage rights, free of cost to the Government and of annual rental.

Mr. AMES. Then, have I overstated the proposition?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I think you have.

Mr. AMES. In what way?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I will try to answer the gentleman from Massachusetts as clearly as I can. The engineers for the company, New York gentlemen who have investigated this proposition——

Mr. AMES. If the gentleman from Alabama will permit, I understood the gentleman, when he spoke the other day, to say that northern engineers had gone down and viewed this projected enterprise of your Alabama company, and had advised that company that to manufacture water power only at their dam above navigable water would not be an advisable enterprise——

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. That is right——

Mr. AMES. And recommended that they manufacture water power in two places.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Yes. If they could secure the concession by the raising of Dam 17.

Mr. AMES. I sought in my mind a reason for that, and it occurred to me, as it would to anyone who thinks about it, that for them to build their dam above navigable water and by some possibility the Government decided upon one dam and not three, so that water power might be developed at the Government dam, their investment would be thrown away, because they could not compete with the power developed at the Government dam with sixty-odd feet head. That is the reason why I asked if this bill, stripped of all but its proper title, does not mean that the Alabama corporation does not want to compete with power developed by the Government dam.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. No; I do not think it does, because the Alabama corporation does not expect nor does any Alabama citizen expect the Government to develop water power at that dam and run a power plant of its own.

Mr. AMES. The gentleman and I agree that the Government ought to build one dam rather than three.

Mr. TALOR of Alabama. Yes; and I say the Government ought to develop water power there, but the Government will not do it.

Mr. AMES. The Government ought to be forced to do it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. We can not afford to wait until the Government is ready to go into that business. We want our development to precede that. The Government can resume its rights on that proposition whenever it wants to, but I do not want the Government to build three or more dams and lose the water power which can be obtained by raising one dam to 63 feet lift instead.

Mr. AMES. I quite agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Now, the question is to dispose of that water power. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] desires further to ask questions, I will try to answer; otherwise I would like to proceed with my remarks. As I view the situation, the Government has a navigation proposition which the engineers suggest had better be solved in this way: It is more economical to build one dam to produce the same amount of slack water and furnish the same amount of navigation that would be furnished by five dams, independently of whether there is any water power developed or not. If that dam is built to a height of 63 feet, then the engineers notify Congress that power can be generated there; but they can not raise the dam so as to generate it unless Congress authorizes it to be done.

Mr. AMES. Why?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Because a dam for the mere locking of a river, to furnish water on which to run steamboats, is a very different dam from one necessary to provide power.

Mr. AMES. Oh, not very different.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I will take out the word "very." It is sufficiently different that the engineers, unless specially authorized to make the change, would not and could not erect a dam with foundations for generating water power under authority to provide locks and dams for navigation alone.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] use some of his time?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the idea contained in this proposition is not altogether new to me, although this particular project is.

This question arises incidentally in matters coming before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I am not yet satisfied as a legal question that where the Government undertakes to improve navigable rivers for purposes of navigation within a State it acquires any property right to anything that is not used, or needed to be used, in the navigation of that stream or the maintenance of the improvement for navigation purposes. I am not yet satisfied that when the question is made the courts will hold that this incidental power, which has only become valuable and important since the development of electricity, belongs to the Government. I am not aware that that question has yet been made before the courts.

If the Government has a property right in this water power, to be used for other purposes than maintaining navigation, it has an absolute and unfettered property right. It not only has a right to use that water power for its own purposes in maintaining navigation, but would have a right to use it in operating machinery for Government purposes. What is the difference between owning the power by which manufacturing may be done and manufacturing with that power? This is a pretty large question.

I do not expect to address myself very closely to this project, but what does it include? It looks reasonable, it looks just, that where the Government improves a navigable stream for the purpose of navigation, and incidentally growing out of that development a valuable property right or power is created, that inasmuch as the people have to be taxed for creating the power the people should have the return of the revenues growing out of a proper disposition of that property, either by way of lease or absolute sale. That seems to me like a reasonable and just proposition.

But where will it lead us? I am in favor of improving every navigable waterway in this country where the object and purpose is to develop commerce; that is, transportation commerce, transportation upon the stream improved thereby. But what will this kind of legislation lead to? Where some gentlemen, or a corporation, desire to have the Government create a power or an improvement to create a power, the pretext for improving navigation will be what will be brought to Congress. Now, we all know what effect that will have.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman does not think that applies to this particular project?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, I leave that to the Rivers and Harbors Committee, because it knows more about it than I do.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman understands that he himself voted to put in three low dams there.

Mr. SIMS. I voted for the river and harbor bill.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Well, this was included in it.

Mr. SIMS. It provided for the improvement of this river for the purposes of navigation only. Now, is it necessary to improve the navigation of the river to repeal, alter, or amend that law?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman does not understand my question.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; I do. Will the gentleman answer my question: Is it necessary now for the purpose of navigation to alter, amend, or modify the law that now provides for that improvement?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It is very desirable, but it is not necessary. It is considered economical and will save the Government a great deal of money.

Mr. SIMS. I always have a fear of bargain-counter legislation. Now, the River and Harbor Committee, when it had before it the purpose of improving the river for navigation only, did not conceive of a 63-foot dam and did not provide for it. Now, who started this? Has this come up upon the motion of the River and Harbor Committee with the view of creating a better navigation project than the one the law now provides for? I have not heard that claim made. The law is already passed, the appropriation is already made, the contracts are already let, and are sufficient for the purposes of improving this river for the only purpose which I contend Congress has any power to do, and that is navigation.

Now, it is proposed to amend or modify that law and even change the contracts so as not to improve navigation but create a water power. Is not that true?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman will be brief; I have not much time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I voted for the river and harbor bill.

Mr. SIMS. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. After we have authorized the construction of three dams the engineers investigated the matter and concluded that we can get along by building one dam for the purposes of navigation and that thereby we can save $250,000, not saying a word about the water power. Would not the gentleman favor that?

Mr. SIMS. I am in favor right now of making any modification, alteration, or amendment of this law which of itself is in the interest of navigation, divorcing it entirely from the creation of any water power or sale or disposal of same. If you will strike out of this bill the proposition to dispose of this property, assuming that the Government owns it, to individuals, corporations, or anybody else, until after the project has been completed and we know what we have got to sell or lease, I am perfectly willing to take the judgment of the Rivers and Harbors Committee and vote for that amendment, because I do not want to put any obstruction in the way of improving navigation.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Would the gentleman object to the alteration of this plan to build the dam 63 feet high if by so doing he could create a water power that could be sold and thereby cheapen the improvement on the river to the people?

Mr. SIMS. I do object seriously to creating by legislation an improvement of a water power that has not for its object and purpose improving navigation, but to create a water power for the Government to let it to favorites or anybody else.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I would call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the river and harbor act approved June 25, 1909, which requires the engineers in making an investigation of the improvement contemplated to obtain a survey and report, "as provided for herein or as may be hereafter provided for," and, in addition to full information, and so forth, a report as to the development and utilization of water power for industrial and commercial purposes.

Mr. SIMS. Growing out of the improvement of the river.

Mr. SMALL. What was the purpose of that act, if not to utilize it?

Mr. SIMS. I said that wherever a water power is created or grows out of a navigation project, per se—in other words, where navigation is the object and purpose and water power is the mere inevitable incident or accident following it—then, if within a State the Government has the power to dispose of that property, it should be disposed of as the Government would any other kind of property to which it has undisputed title.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Would it make any difference in the gentleman's views if he know that there was no water power to be developed by the building of this dam 63 feet high?

Mr. SIMS. If it is to the interest of navigation to build it 100 feet high, considering navigation only, then I will vote for it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. And that the only power that is to be developed would be by this company constructing this dam 100 feet high?

Mr. SIMS. Well, I do not want the temptation continually held out to gentlemen or corporations throughout the United States to come to Congress and advocate the improvement of a stream for navigation, ostensibly, when in fact their intention is to create a power in the hands of the Government and then get control of it afterwards. I think, like the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], that we ought to pass a general law, and if we do recognize an absolute property right in the Government to power incidentally created by navigation-improvement projects, to provide in a general law how that power shall be disposed of, and that it shall not be disposed of to a particular individual or corporation, by the terms of the act authorizing the particular project. I understood the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to say, and I may be mistaken, that there are already four large power projects within reach of Birmingham, so no industry there will suffer for lack of power, and it seems from the argument made here that competition will be ample, so that after this thing has been made it may prove to be a commercial failure. Then who is to enforce the payment of $15,000 a year for 20 years; how is the Government to get the money? A $50,000 bond would not cover it for 20 years, and the company is to have it for 20 years for $1 a horsepower per annum before the Secretary of War has any right to ask for a readjustment. I am not confining my objection to this particular bill, but if we pass a bill of this nature, where it is admittedly not necessary to improve the stream for navigation, where there is no claim that it is done in the interest of navigation——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. SIMS. But the gentleman just now told me that the law was sufficient for navigation.

Mr. SPARKMAN. But it is a distinct advantage to build that dam 63 feet high.

Mr. SIMS. Then why did not you recommend it in the first place?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Because the engineers did not report it that way.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Simply because they could not see any advantage in building that dam 100 feet high.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman think that the engineers ought never——

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I must get through with my remarks, and I shall decline to yield.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman possibly remembers that Members of the House took up about 40 minutes of my time the other day in propounding questions.

Mr. SIMS. I did not.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I thought probably that might influence the gentleman somewhat in yielding to me.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman ought not to take out his revenge upon me when I absolutely let him alone. Now, if the Army engineers prepare a project for improvement of a waterway before a water-power temptation is suggested and then change their plans afterwards and make a different report, we do not know what the next report will be, and therefore I say it is not safe when authorizing navigation projects as such to include a proposition to affirmatively create a water power. Even the incidental power is dangerous, though it can not be helped. It furnishes an excuse and an argument for making appropriations to improve streams simply for the profits that may grow out of the incidental power or incidental property that is created rather than for the benefit of commerce and navigation that would exist without it. It is like this cry for a tariff for revenue with incidental protection. Nine times out of ten the Member who is advocating a tariff for revenue with incidental protection is moved by the incidental protection rather than the revenue to come from it. Now, the temptation will go out to the country that we will vote to improve a river ostensibly for navigation, but in fact to create a water power and thus get it at a price at which privately owned and privately created power can not compete. Now, the unnavigable streams may have great power developed or created and the Government have absolutely no control of it. Why, I suppose a short distance above this, 40 or 60 miles, the stream is not navigable; yet a power might be created there by private capital, and right below there is a 20-year absolute contract for $1 per horsepower. Who would put a dollar as a private individual in the improvement of a water power located above that point where navigation is not intended or contemplated that would have to compete with this power? Whenever you improve rivers ostensibly for navigation, but simply to create a power, and then lease it out for a great number of years at a mere nominal figure, you absolutely block private enterprise in locating industries in that section of the country where they have to compete with that power.

I think we should take up this question and look at it in all its aspects, not in reference to this particular bill merely. Nobody knows what power is going to be worth 20 years from now. It is utterly impossible to tell. What was it worth 20 years ago? I do not suppose that water power at this place 20 or 30 years ago would have sold for 5 cents a horsepower per annum. It is the developing of electric power generated by water power that is creating this revolution, and the value of electric power is in the use of it beyond its place of creation, which depends almost entirely upon the expense of transmission. Now, that is one of the great problems that is being worked out, the cheapening of transmission. Suppose the transmission of electric power from this point to Birmingham and other cities is reduced half or less than half in the next 20 years of what it now is. You have developed a value in that water power without spending a dollar. Now, if this is a proper right inhering in the Government and belonging to it, it ought then never under any circumstance to let it out, lease or sell it in any way other than as provided by a general law as to the disposing of Government property under any and all circumstances. Why I do not understand that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors proposes or would for a moment think about approving a navigation project simply that water power might be thereby created where none existed, but that in effect is what this bill does. It is true, if I understand the gentleman from Alabama, there is no usable water power that now arises out of the improvement of the river as now proposed by law, so then as it is not necessary in order to improve the river to create a water power, therefore logically the object of this bill is to create a water power by the Government of the United States by the taxes of the United States——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SIMS. By the Public Treasury of the United States, and if that is true, the fruits of that expenditure are in the people of the United States and should not be leased out to individuals or corporations for 50 years by the very act authorizing the improvement.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Now, if it saves in the navigation project of the river many hundreds of thousands of dollars, is it not in the interest of the Treasury of the United States to change the existing plans?

Mr. SIMS. I have seen too much of the danger of bargain-counter legislation going on here in the District of Columbia to be favorably impressed with such an argument. Gentlemen go out as private individuals and get options on tracts of land near Washington City, and then come rushing to Congress, claiming that they have secured it below its real value, that it was advancing rapidly, and asking the Government to buy it in order to keep the Government from having to pay too much for it in the future, arguing that it would be a matter of economy for the Government to buy this land for park purposes. Some such legislation has gone through, while other similar propositions have failed. I have never yet seen a single instance where a gentleman came to this House with an option in his pocket and begging to give something to the Government for less than it was worth, when the Government failed to buy it that he exercised the option and took the property himself.

This is speculative, my friends. You do not know whether this power will be a success or not. You do not know whether it will have to meet a stifling competition or not; and yet the gentleman is willing to tear down and tear up by the roots a bill which he passed, and which was in the interests of navigation, and which he made all of us believe—and, I think, correctly—provided for everything that navigation demanded, simply, forsooth, that we may get from leasing this power a return of money which will ultimately make the improvement cost the Government less.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The final cost. Whether the power is lost or not, it will cost $257,000.

Mr. SIMS. If you will strike out the disposal of this power to anybody, then I will vote for any bill which the gentleman thinks is necessary as a better scheme for improving navigation. But I do not think this bill ought to pass, when the gentleman admits we have already a law providing for navigation; and a little difference of two or three hundred thousand dollars in cost should not delay the work. Do you not suppose that the gentleman who has the contract, and has spent a number of thousands of dollars, is going to have something out of it?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Has the gentleman time to yield to a question?

Mr. SIMS. To a question.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The Government is building a series of dams in this river for the purpose of improving navigation. Incidentally it develops a water power for which the Government proposes to impose a charge. How does the gentleman distinguish in principle between a charge by the Government for the use of this incidentally developed water power and a charge by the Government for the use of this navigable stream which it has improved out of its own funds?

Mr. SIMS. I do not see any difference in principle. Whenever we deepen a channel and enable it to carry more freight we may just as well charge the ship or boat that carries that freight and tonnage as to create a water power by public taxation and then lease or sell it.

Mr. EDWARDS. Is the gentleman in favor of giving free of charge this right to this corporation?

Mr. SIMS. No; I am not. The same danger remains that corporations will get behind improvements of this sort where navigation does not require it.

Mr. EDWARDS. I want to ask the gentleman if he knows of any water power in the country or any other large enterprise that is being developed strictly by an individual? The gentleman seems to dwell on the word "corporation."

Mr. SIMS. We have no business to pass legislation by which profits can be made. It is like the tariff argument, when they come in here and pass a law to levy a tax on imports in order that the domestic producer may sell them higher than he otherwise could. Whenever an industry ought to be developed capital will be found to do it without any protective legislation or any monopoly control.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Just another question, if the gentleman will permit me. The gentleman said a moment ago there was no difference in the principle of a charge for the use of water power and charge for the use of the stream; now he says to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS] that he is not in favor of giving the use of this power to a private corporation.

Mr. SIMS. Not without charge, or with a nominal charge.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Is the gentleman in favor of giving the use of this navigable stream to private steamboat companies without charge or compensation?

Mr. SIMS. I am not going to be drawn off on a hypothetical question.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. You said there was not any difference.

Mr. SIMS. There might not be. I doubt if the Government has anything here to give. If it has, it owns it absolutely.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What does the Government own of the river?

Mr. SIMS. Nothing, except to improve navigation and protect that improvement.

Now, let me read a little to you Democrats from the Democratic platform, the last one we adopted. In speaking of the natural resources the platform goes on to say:

> We insist upon * * * the reclamation of swamp lands, the clarification of streams, the development of water power, and the preservation of the electric power generated by this natural force, from the control of monopoly.

Whenever we let out, by the very act creating the power, to an individual or to a corporation the right to use it for 20 years for a nominal charge, we certainly give a monopolistic control of that power for 20 years; and we will have done it in the very act creating the power if we pass this bill.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Supposing that in a legitimate project for improving a river the Government should build a dam that would develop, say, 15,000 horsepower. I want to know what disposition of that developed power the gentleman would make?

Mr. SIMS. If the Government owns that power, it owns it absolutely for all purposes whatsoever, and I then would make the best use of it that possibly could be made. If the Government itself could not use the power for governmental purposes, I would lease it out to the highest bidder and let that highest bidder give bonds to secure the lease money, whether the project entered upon succeeded or failed.

Mr. RAKER. Then, leaving it to public auction, it would be wholly immaterial whether it was a private individual or a corporation, provided they paid a reasonable and legitimate rent for that privilege?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; certainly. The Government always has the right to accept or refuse bids.

Now, Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman give me a few moments more?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. Now, my friends, at this time, when the whole country is aroused over Government favoritism by way of tariff legislation and monopolistic grants, it is no time to create water power by changing an existing project in order to create a power that otherwise would not exist, and let it out for the pitiful charge of $1 per horsepower for 20 years.

Mr. MADDEN. It is 50 years, is it not?

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not 50 years, as provided in the bill?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; 20 years, with power to adjust it further for 30 years.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. The gentleman did not object to another project in Alabama where the time limit was placed at 99 years.

Mr. SIMS. I used to be a citizen of Alabama. I am proud of Alabama. It lies next to my own section in Tennessee. Many of the people of Alabama came from Tennessee, and that is the reason why they have such good people in Alabama. But this proposition extends beyond Alabama and the vicinity of my State.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I always try to "tote" fair with the whole country.

Mr. SIMS. Yes. But this thing of favoring legislation on account of good-fellowship toward a Member or Members of Congress ought not to exist for a moment. I do not care how good a Member may be, his project should not command our support except upon its merits. The question should be, What is in this project and what grows out of it? not who introduces it, not what State is to be benefited, not whether its sponsor and advocate is a Democrat or a Republican or an insurgent. The question should be, What is the inherent merit of the thing itself? And then Members should vote their convictions after making the best investigation they can. Why, gentlemen, you can dig a canal where there is not a drop of water now and create a water power there by digging that canal. We should dig no canals and make no improvements of waterways except for legitimate objects of navigation and not to create water power and then turn it over to monopolistic control. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, how much time remains unused on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. EDWARDS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2958) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected."

BLACK WARRIOR RIVER.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I think this House ought to examine propositions of this kind with a good deal of care before it gives away public property of great value. This bill is open to serious objection. It fixes too low a price for a rental; it is wholly inadequate. It ought to sell the right to the highest bidder in order that the public may receive value received for this valuable grant.

Again, the maximum price the consumer is to pay should be fixed in this bill, better provision for regulations of rentals to be paid to Government should be made, so that the same may be regulated every five years. Again, the rentals should commence at once or as soon as completed and not in 1920, as now provided in the bill.

In what I shall say during the short time allotted me I shall endeavor to notice some of these objections and point out as well as I can its most objectionable features. The value of all such properties as here involved should receive careful consideration by Congress and be managed in the interests of the public and not in the interests of private speculators. As I view this measure, it is for the latter purpose, and hence I am opposed to it.

This is a bill ostensibly for the purpose of improving navigation, but for the real purpose of building a water power for a private corporation, which is a myth to-day, so far as we know, to speculate upon in the commercial marts of speculation. For the purpose of demonstrating to the House the correctness of my statement on that point, I call your attention to the last clause of section 1 of the amended bill, which, after naming the other purposes, reads:

> And for the development of a water power.

That is the real purpose of this bill. I do not care who is behind it. That is the real object for which it is proposed to change the process of improving the navigation of this stream. True, it fixes a rental charge, but the time for it to accrue is postponed nearly a decade.

Now, when does the rental begin? Section 4 fully discloses the purpose of this bill, which is to rent this water power, after the Government has created it free of expense for this company out of the public money belonging to the people.

Another section in the bill provides that this rental shall begin in 1920, nine years from now. What was the object of the gentleman who drew this bill in thus postponing the time when it should begin to pay, if it was not for a speculation upon the public, when the bill turns this water power over to this company within a year, and they do not make this minimum rental begin until 1920? Why is not a minimum rental provided for the nine ensuing years between this time and 1920?

One other thing peculiar about this transaction. Who are the members of this corporation? Nobody in this House so far has been able to tell who compose it. I believe the president of it has been named here this morning, and the gentleman who named him said he did not know him. If this is a company organized in good faith and for good purposes, why not give the names of the incorporators to this House in order that we may know to whom we are giving this great gift? If it is composed of public exploiters, we ought to know it. Why conceal their identity?

Now, let us consider the compensation provided by the bill for the use of this valuable property. I am astonished. One dollar per horsepower, and the minimum quantity fixed by the bill is 15,000 horsepower per annum. Did anybody ever figure what a compensation that is? Why, with the 15,000 horsepower at $50 per horsepower per year this company will earn an enormous sum.

At the end of 50 years, the time proposed for this grant, it will have earned for the company $37,500,000, for which you, the guardians of the Public Treasury, have provided that this company shall pay only $750,000. Can any Member on this floor, regarding the rights of the people back at home and the best interests of the Government, vote to give away that much property for such an insignificant sum as that? What is the difference? A net profit of more than $36,000,000, for which they pay the pitiful sum of $750,000. What man who believes that the people of this country have yet some rights can stand upon this floor and argue for the passage of such an iniquitous and unfair measure as this? I am unable to understand human nature and human dealings if that be so. It is the duty of this Congress to get as fair a compensation for the public as it can. It ought not to be exorbitant, but above all it ought to be fair. It ought to be just to both sides. What man is willing to give to this company, with which to go out upon the public markets and speculate, property worth $37,500,000 at a maximum rental of $750,000? It is not right, and I do not believe this House, however friendly it may feel to the membership of any State, will give away the public property in that kind of a style.

What can Alabama lose if you put this up at public auction, with a provision in this bill that it shall not sell for less than $1 per horsepower per annum? What could be your objection, if you want fair dealing in this measure, if you want to uncover the myth that stands behind it with veiled face? Why not make a provision in the bill that it shall be sold to the highest bidder, and that the minimum price shall be $1 per horsepower, which you are now offered? Does the chairman of the committee or any member of the committee object to that kind of an amendment to this bill? If so, I should like to know why.

This is a matter that belongs to the public, one of great public concern, and the day ought to be near at hand when these public utilities shall bear the expenses of this Government, so that we can wipe out a protective tariff for raising revenues for that purpose. If you will apply proper business methods to the things that nature has furnished, for which charges can be made, and prove beneficial to the public, we can raise enough revenue to defray the expenses of the Government, economically administered, and relieve the public of the burdens of raising the revenues by taxing the necessities of life. Nature has furnished ample assets upon which charges can be made for the raising of revenues for the Government and relieve the people of burdens now imposed on them. To these methods we should apply business principles and care for the future.

But some gentlemen have said that Tennessee gave the right for 99 years in a similar matter and therefore you ought to give the right here for 50 years If Tennessee did wrong, if Tennessee injures her citizens by profligate gifts, that is no reason why we should follow her example, but a reason why we should disregard it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have heard that statement made two or three times on the floor, that the Congress of the United States granted the right to a private corporation in Tennessee for 99 years for nothing on a lock and dam. That lock and dam happen to be now in process of construction in my district, and I want to correct the statement. The terms upon which Congress granted the franchise for an electric power were that the company should construct and build the lock and dam and run it without expense to the Government of the United States for the purposes of navigation, and I want to say that it has cost these private citizens about $3,000,000.

Mr. CULLOP. I was going to make a better argument than that. I was going to say that because there was a bad bargain on the Tennessee matter it furnishes no excuse to make a bad bargain now.

Again it has been said that in the Niagara great volumes of power are being furnished free.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has 18 minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana 3 more minutes.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, if a bad bargain was made there it is all the better reason for making a good bargain here. These things belong to the public and ought to earn the public money every year they are in existence and in operation. [Applause.]

Let us see. The policy upon this question ought to be fixed, ought to be fixed by general law and not be for a private interest like this. Any lawyer who will take this bill and analyze it will find that nearly every provision is so wide open that you could throw your hat through it in favor of the corporation every time. Take the one about the payment for power and limiting it to only two places for which charges shall be made, although it may be distributed at half a dozen others. Now, if the minimum is $15,000 a year, with the growing possibilities of the development of electricity, what would the maximum be in this instance a few years hence? We have figured the remuneration to the Government upon the minimum sale and minimum production, the benefit to the mythical corporation upon the minimum basis also. What ought this to earn? I say to this House, and I put it up to every business man in it, that $1 per month for horsepower for the first five years would be a very moderate charge, and any man who knows anything about the cost of water power will tell you that I have named a very reasonable price.

Mr. Chairman, what is the cost when the Government builds the dam and furnishes the water—what is the cost to this company? Can anybody tell? It is a mere minimum. The expense in this matter of the development of water power is in building the dam for the conservation of the water and the rest is a mere bagatelle. What are you doing? You are spending a large sum of money, if this measure passes, to build a dam to make a water power for a private mythical corporation that no man on this floor has been able—and if able, unwilling—to give the name of the men who constitute it to the detriment of the people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have just listened to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], who furnishes a striking illustration of what a "mare's nest" a vivid imagination can find when the speaker is not conversant with the facts about which he is talking and wants something in the RECORD for home consumption. He forcibly demonstrates just how ridiculous a Member can be that constantly talks about something of which he knows nothing.

He makes the statement that it is the purpose of the Government to furnish this power free of charge to the company. That statement is not correct. The Government, in the first place, proposes to charge this company for the power, and, in the next place, the company is to secure a large amount of valuable land, that is to be overflowed, and to convey the right to the Government to overflow this area. The company also proposes to build a million and a half dollar reservoir before the power can be used. Less oratory and more attention to the committee report on behalf of the gentleman would have caused him to avoid this mistake.

The gentleman finds another great objection, about which he exclaims in dramatic tones, also for home consumption, that we are going to wait until 1920 before we charge the full maximum amount for the power developed, and he thought there was something wrong about that portion of the bill. The gentleman does not know that it takes 10 years to complete the dam and that we do not propose to charge the maximum amount until the dam is completed and the power furnished. It seems to be a great outrage just at present, in the minds of many gentlemen, to show any fairness or common business honesty in dealing with a corporation. What a change there would be if these heroic "friends of the people" were compelled to act according to what they preach in the speeches they deliver. Then the gentleman goes on and makes a great attack upon the rate that is proposed to be charged.

Mr. Chairman, I am not very much in sympathy with any of these speeches made on the floor of the House crying out against corporations in the name of the "people." Even for home consumption they become tiresome. I would like to ask the gentlemen who make this kind of speeches who is it that is going to buy this power from this corporation? It is not the people, not the individual, but the great manufacturing corporations that are going to purchase this power. Are gentlemen so sympathetic they are afraid that these corporations are going to have to pay an exorbitant price for the power? Why denounce one corporation and weep for another? It seems to me that every time you place an additional obstruction, an additional restriction upon granting this power to this company, you are going to place that additional handicap upon this company when it tries to sell that power to the consumer in competition with other power companies. I am not concerned very much about the money that goes into the National Treasury—the $15,000 per year—that does not amount to but little; but I am concerned in the people of that part of the country getting the use of this great river. As a minority member of that committee, I want to state briefly some of the reasons why I favor this bill.

First, I favor it because it will not increase the cost of improving that river for navigation. In fact, it reduces the cost, and in reducing that cost you at the same time develop a large amount of water power. It is no secret that I am not in favor of the general proposition of the Government going into the water-power business. I recognize the great force in what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] says, that there is great danger that we will enter upon the proposition of improving rivers for the purpose of power instead of navigation. But I was confronted with this proposition, whether or not being fully satisfied this proposition was right, and well guarded, I would oppose it for fear hereafter some wrong might be done, using this case as a pretext. The question is simply this: Do you propose to let this water power be developed when it will not cost the Government anything, or do you propose to let that river continue to run as it always has—unused. We are here to-day in this position in this House on this bill that we often find in municipal elections. We often see there the saloon keeper and the prohibitionists working together, and that is exactly the situation here to-day.

We have the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] on the one side, who is opposed to the Government doing anything, and the other extremist we have in the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], who wants the Government to do everything; and between the two the river will continue to flow unvexed to the sea, and we will have conservation there as we have had it since the dawn of creation. This seems to be the popular idea just now of conservation, that we must conserve by leaving our resources undeveloped. I do not rejoice in the bad luck of my friends from the South, but I can not help feeling a little bit of satisfaction that they are now having handed out to them a small dose of what we in the West have to take for a regular diet. They are now facing what we have faced every day. They are now up against the proposition we of the West are facing, with these extreme conservationists on one side and the extreme opponents of the Government doing anything of this kind on the other. Between the two our resources are not conserved, but are either undeveloped or wasted.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question that I asked the other day and to which I was not able to get any satisfactory answer. He has studied this carefully and can answer it, I am sure. The thing I am objecting to particularly in this bill is what is set forth on page 11, lines 5 and 6:

> And for converting to its own use, benefit, and profit the power developed with the surplus water not needed for lockage.

Then in the report of the committee, at page 3——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, if the gentleman is going to read the bill and the report, I will have to decline to yield.

Mr. WILLIS. It is stated on page 3 of the report that there is an exclusive grant to the company to use and dispose of this power. Now, the thing I want to know about is, What is there in the bill anywhere to protect the rights of the consumers of this power?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The right that the consumer has is the same right that every other consumer has that purchases power from any company. Speaking personally, I am opposed to this Government saying what price this corporation shall sell its power for. The State has the authority, or it ought to have—it does in my State—if this company charges too much for its power, to regulate the price; but when you give the power to this Government to say that it will regulate the price at which the corporation shall sell to the consumer, you simply add one more power to the Government.

You will simply add one more place to be filled by one more Government employee, to be fed by the taxpayers of the country; and I am opposed to it. This constant encroachment of Government bureaus upon the local affairs of States and communities and individuals is one of the most dangerous tendencies in our Government at this time.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask further, does the gentleman think it is a wise policy for the Government now to appropriate public money to create this great water power and then trust to the State to regulate the price at which that power shall be sold to the consumers?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Most emphatically not. I am opposed to the Government spending anything to develop water power. But the Government is not paying a cent for the development of this water power, is not appropriating one dollar for that purpose. That is where the gentleman does not seem to understand the situation. The Government by raising the height of this dam improves navigation and incidentally develops this water power and saves money by it, and that is the reason I am in favor of it. Then, you have this situation: Having developed this water power without any cost to the Government, and the Government having the right to control it as it owns the land surrounding it and on which it is constructed, what are you going to do? Are you going to permit it to run to waste or are you going to sell it? That is all there is to this proposition.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield for another brief question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. It is said that this will cost the Government less—I so understood a gentleman—by something like a million dollars.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not think that much less.

Mr. WILLIS. Some one said about that much less. If that is true my point is it is good policy to make the improvement, but to leave this matter of the sale of water power to be determined afterwards; to sell it to the highest bidder and not deal with this question now.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am glad the gentleman calls my attention to that matter. In the committee I proposed—it was not in executive session—I proposed such an amendment, but after the engineers presented the facts about the situation, and after the question was thoroughly discussed, the reason I no longer insisted upon that proposition was that I was convinced it would be absolutely——

Mr. KOPP. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Not at this moment. The reason I was not opposed and did not insist that a clause of that kind go into the bill was this: That after the engineers had explained the situation that this company had rights farther up the river, and that without the development up the river there would not be sufficient power here to make it worth while for any company to use it, under all the circumstances I was absolutely convinced it would be a waste of time and utterly useless, as no other company was in position to bid for the power; and as there was an emergency here, inasmuch as these contracts had already been let, and if we are going to change it would have to be changed immediately, is the reason why I did not insist upon such a clause going in the bill providing that the power be sold to the highest and best bidder.

Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. As a matter of information, I would like to hear from the gentleman on this question, not upon the merits of the bill, but what is the emergency that this bill should have priority over all other bills at this special session of Congress?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman will permit me, it has been explained many times upon the floor of this House during this debate. The emergency is this: That if you are going to make a change it must be done now, because contracts for the construction of the other dams already authorized have all been let, and unless the change is authorized to be made now the contractor will go ahead with the work. That is the emergency.

Mr. KOPP. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. KOPP. Suppose this bill becomes a law. In the gentleman's opinion will this franchise which the company has be taxable under the laws of the State of Alabama?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is a matter I do not know anything about.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I will answer the gentleman; yes.

Mr. KOPP. Has there been an estimate of the value that power will be?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I can not answer any of the gentleman's questions.

Mr. KOPP. May I ask the gentleman from Alabama, who seems to be familiar with it?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The cost of producing horsepower is usually figured at $100—capitalized at $100—so $15,000 would be $1,500,000 it would cost to produce it, as a rule.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to say another word in regard to the 50-year clause. The House will doubtless recall that when the question arose in what was called the Long Sault development proposition I was opposed to granting a 99-year franchise. I was one of the two members of the committee that came on the floor of the House and fought that proposition. I thought the time was too long. I have not been opposed to the 50-year franchise in this bill, because that is the number of years that has been fixed in the general law for power propositions of this character, and for the further reason that it developed before the committee that there were several other power companies in that part of the country with which this company would be a competitor, and their franchises were either for 50 years or more. And I thought every restriction you placed in this franchise that the other corporation did not have would to that extent handicap this company in its competition with them, and I do not think it would be of advantage to the consumer to do this.

Mr. McCALL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. McCALL. Must there be a revaluation of the amount to be paid for a certain number of years before the expiration of the franchise?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It provides for readjusting the price to be paid at every 10-year period after the first 20-year period, and the first one was fixed at 20 because it was estimated it would take 10 years to complete the project.

Mr. McCALL. Is there anything to establish the Government revaluation? Is it on whatever the water power may be worth at the time?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is established. Whatever the War Department may see fit to fix as the price.

I yield back whatever time I have left.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman said a moment ago there were several other power companies in the vicinity that would become competitors of this company, and that their franchise was for 50 years.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is according to the information I have.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If these other power companies could become competitors of this company, would it not be well for the Government to develop this power and thereby have navigation, and leave the subject of the disposal of the power to these competitive companies and others that might be in the field at that time?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The proposition of the gentleman is absolutely correct; that is, on the general proposition; and I just said, in explanation, that owing to the fact that this company had other rights farther up the river no other company could come in and compete with it under present conditions was why I did not insist upon an amendment to that effect.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. It is difficult to see how they could compete in the business and not in the purchase of the power.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Because the company mentioned in the bill has other rights on the river that gives it too great an advantage. This has already been fully explained several times.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that the discussion of this bill is not so valuable upon the particular bill under consideration as it is in showing the temper of this House, and, I believe, of the country, in reference to the resources of the country and their proper disposition and the protection of the rights of the people.

In the Fifty-ninth Congress there was passed what was known as the general dam law. In the Sixty-first Congress there was another law passed in reference to the building of dams which had a provision which was not in the first law, and that was that in the case of any dam constructed for the purpose of creating a reservoir at the head of a navigable stream to be used for the purpose of navigation the Government should have the right to charge whatever should be reasonable for the use of that water power which was developed. And I am glad that this discussion has taken place here for two or three days, as it will demonstrate to the country that Congress has arrived at a time when they do not propose to give away without some consideration valuable franchises to a corporation that may go out and squeeze the people by charging an exorbitant price for the water power which is granted. We have the right here under this law to charge whatever is right for the use of water to produce power, and when we charge for that power it occurs to me that it is the duty of Congress, or the duty somewhere, to see that the rights of the people shall be protected and that no corporation shall be given an exclusive right to charge what it sees fit. [Applause.]

It has been said here that Congress gave away to corporations in New York for 99 years the right to take water from the Niagara River and develop water power there, and it has been demonstrated time and time again, and it is a fact well known to every man who is familiar with the history of those great corporations, that they are combined so completely that they charge the people of the great city of Buffalo whatever they see fit, and the people of the city have been unable to help themselves.

Now, I do not know what this franchise is worth down in Alabama. It may be worth only a dollar a horsepower; it may be worth $25. But whatever it is worth, the Government should receive the pay for it, and even then there should be vested in some agency or tribunal or department the power to see that the proper regulation of rates is made for the people who have to buy that power. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It seems to me idle to say that the corporations and not the people will pay for this. It may be true that corporations may use this power for manufacturing purposes, but in the end the people have to pay for it. [Applause.]

I believe that this bill, properly amended, ought to pass, because the people down in that community ought to have this water power developed before it is too late; but I believe it should be properly amended, and if it is not, I will not stand upon this floor and vote for any bill, I care not from what section of the country it may come, that does not properly look out for the rights of the people. [Applause.]

Both the National and State Governments have been too free in the past in granting valuable rights to use the natural resources of the country, and when the corporations once get control they combine to compel the people to contribute to their selfish designs. The people have at last awakened to the fact that they have been induced to part with the valuable natural treasures of our country. In my judgment it is the duty of Congress to protect the rights of the people. In our hands is intrusted the duty to legislate for the people and to save the natural wealth of our country. It is a hopeful sign that in a few years Congress has heeded the voice of the people on the subject of our natural resources. I am sure it is not the intention of Congress to prevent the proper development of water power wherever that is possible in the improvement of the rivers for navigation, but when the power is developed it should not be given away without some control being vested somewhere so the people's rights will be preserved.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, how much time has this side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida has 10 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois has 6 minutes remaining.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD one of the most interesting contributions to the waterway literature of this country. It is entitled "Waterways as Creators of Prosperity," and was written a few months ago by Mr. S. A. Thompson, of Indiana, a close student of the subject of waterways as affecting transportation for the past 25 years. The National Rivers and Harbors Congress, which published this article, has sent a copy of it to every Member of the American Congress, and I hope each one has read it.

A perusal of its pages will give the reader a clearer apprehension of the fundamental and vital relation which transportation bears to every form of human activity, whether individual or collective; a better understanding of the uses, limitations, essential functions, and complementary nature of the three principal methods of transportation; and a completer recognition of the profound and far-reaching influence exerted by improved waterways in the development of natural resources, the production of prosperity, and the growth of cities, States, and nations.

The accuracy and authenticity of the figures used is vouched for, as, except where otherwise noted, they are taken from Government publications and other official sources. Responsibility for the deductions made and the conclusions reached from the facts and figures presented rests, of course, upon the author. Unless it can be shown that these deductions are illogical and these conclusions unwarranted, it follows that "the improvement of our waterways constitutes at once the highest duty and the greatest opportunity which confronts the citizenship and the statesmanship of our country."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the document he mentions. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Following is the document referred to:

WATERWAYS AS CREATORS OF PROSPERITY.

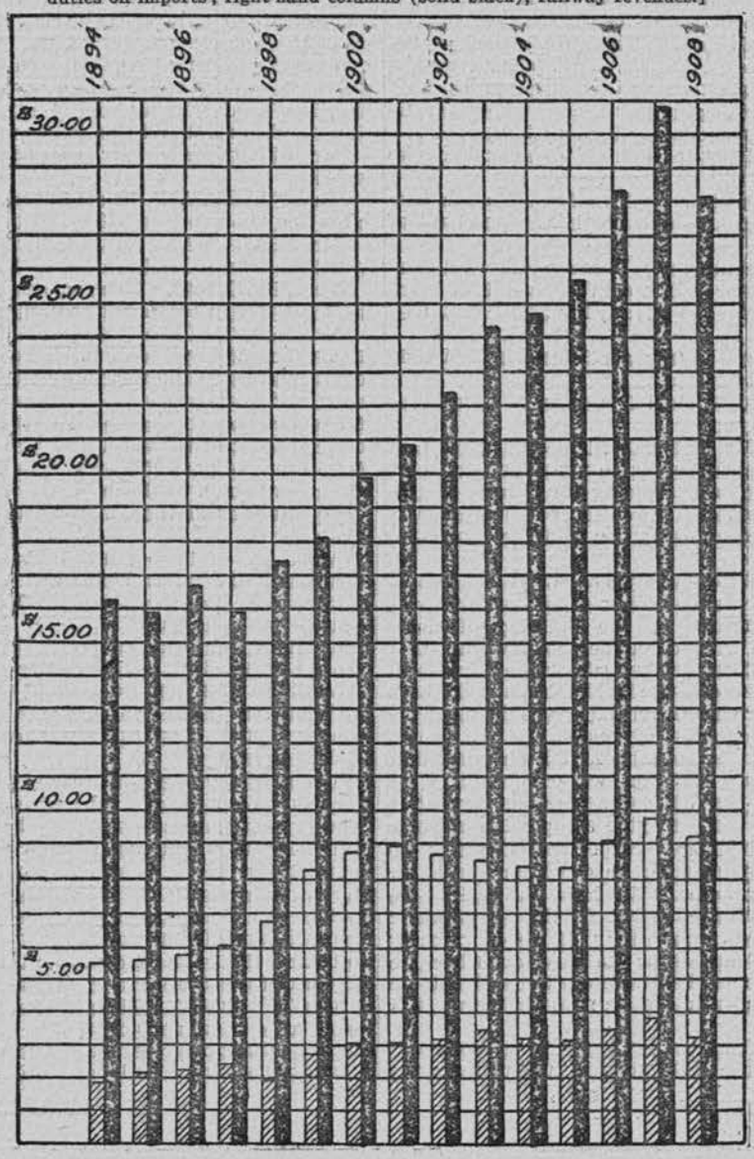
I. TRANSPORTATION AND OTHER TAXES.

Some years ago an enthusiastic inventor used every dollar he had of his own and all he could borrow from his friends in building a colossal machine which he felt certain would make pressed brick faster than they had ever been made before. At last it stood complete, every cam and cog and lever in its proper place, and the proud inventor signaled the engineer to turn on the steam. For a minute or two it seemed that his fondest anticipations were to be fully realized, for from every side of the huge machine the bricks came pouring out in a vertible flood. But then the bricks that followed began to pile up on those that went before, and both were broken. Soon every outlet was hopelessly clogged; the great machine groaned, staggered, stopped; and the power was hastily shut off to keep the whole thing from going to wreck. The machine did make brick faster than they had ever been made before, but it could not be operated because it was impossible to take them away as fast as they were made. The inventor had found a splendid solution for the problem of production, but had forgotten the fundamental problem of distribution, and the shapes of mountain lakes are no more surely fixed by their rocky shores than the possibilities of profitable production are determined by facilities for transportation.

The great mass of the people of the United States have just about as much, or rather as little appreciation of the real importance of the transportation question as the inventor above referred to. Judging by the amount of attention given to it, the tariff question is our greatest national problem. Political parties divide over it; orators declaim about it, some denouncing it as the sum of all villainies, some commending it as the chief bulwark of national prosperity; metropolitan dailies and obscure country weeklies alike fill their columns with articles about it; citizens of all classes and in all parts of the country argue over it; and special sessions of the National Congress are called to consider it.

The tariff is undoubtedly an important matter and probably deserves all the attention that is being given it, but a question of much more far-reaching importance, that of transportation, is receiving comparatively little attention from legislators and the press, and practically none at all from the general public. It is scarcely too much to say that the average citizen does not know there is a transportation question. But transportation affects everything he buys or sells, everything he eats or wears, in fact everything he uses in any way, with the exception of air, sunshine, and, generally, water. The cost of transportation is a tax which bears upon both production and consumption, both industry and commerce. It is taxation without representation, too, for the people, who pay the tax, elect neither those by whom it is levied nor those by whom it is collected, and have practically no voice in determining the rates. To a casual observer it appears that the rates often bear less relation to ability to pay than to inability to escape payment. How do the transportation taxes of the average citizen compare in amount with those he pays on account of the tariff and for other purposes?

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, the average amount per capita collected by the Government of the United States in duties on imported merchandise was $3.84. During the same year the average per capita contribution to the revenues of the railways of the United States was $30.86. That is to say, the transportation taxes levied and collected by the railways in the year named were more than eight times greater in amount than the duties collected on imports by the National Government. That this was not an exceptional case will appear from Diagram No. 1, in which comparative figures, taken from official publications of the Government, are shown graphically for the 15 years ending with 1908. Transportation has the tariff hopelessly beaten at the very outset of the race.



Patriotic Americans are accustomed to consider the Government of the United States a rather large and important affair. This opinion is certainly not without some justification, but financially the Government is completely outclassed by transportation. In the fiscal year 1907 the average receipts of the Government, from all sources except sale of bonds, were $9.84 per capita, while railway revenues, as already stated, were $30.86. Diagram No. 1 shows, for a series of years, the relation between the per capita receipts from customs duties, governmental receipts from all sources, and railway revenues.

These figures become more impressive when stated as aggregates rather than as receipts per capita, for during the 15 years covered by the diagram the amount collected in duties on imports was $3,374,468,851; the total receipts of the National Government from all sources, including postal revenues but not proceeds of bonds, were $8,908,359,045; and the gross earnings and income of the railways of the United States, excluding all duplications due to intercorporate payments, amounted to $25,619,370,590. That is to say, the transportation tax collected from the people of the United States during the years named by the railways alone exceeded the duties on imports by $22,245,000,000 and the total revenues of the National Government by $16,711,000,000. It must already be evident that transportation deserves more attention than it is getting, but the evidence is not yet all in.

DIAGRAM NO. 1.

Average per capita contributions to revenues of United States Government and United States railways, 1894–1908.

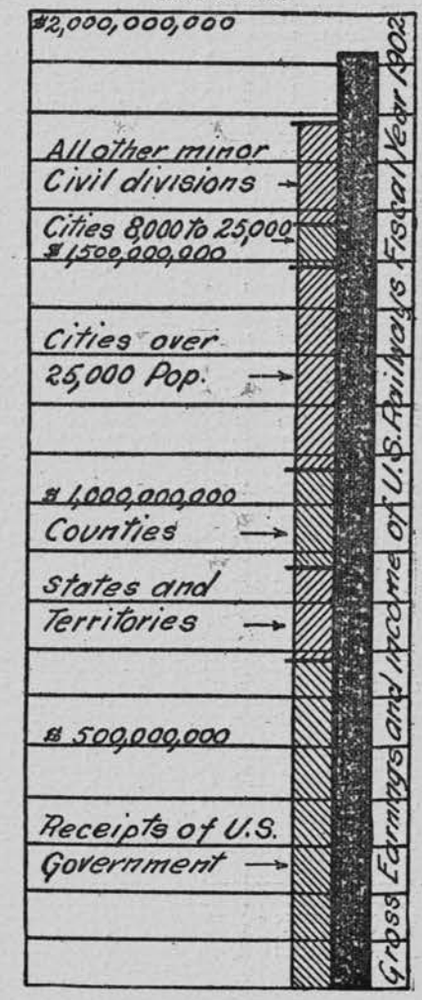
That the average citizen has so little appreciation of the extent to which his interests are affected by transportation is due mainly to the fact that while he is continually paying transportation taxes, commonly called freight bills, he is seldom or never called upon to pay them directly. This is equally true of import duties, internal-revenue taxation, and practically his entire contribution to the support of the National Government. It is an absolute impossibility for anyone to know how much he pays either in transportation taxes or national taxes, because these are parceled out in infinitesimal fractions of a cent on every spoonful of sugar he puts into his cup of coffee, in sums less infinitesimal but equally indistinguishable on every yard of cloth in his coat, and in other amounts, some larger, some smaller, but all equally unknown and unknowable, on everything he buys from one year's end to another. But when he is called upon to contribute his share to the expense of city, county, or state, he must open his checkbook or his pocketbook and pay the tax collector in cash or its equivalent. Then, if he forgets how much his taxes are, he can refresh his memory by looking at his receipt. It is natural and inevitable that a man should be more strongly impressed by the taxes he pays directly than by those he pays indirectly, but it does not follow that the latter are any less than the former. Let us see what the records show in reference to this matter.

In the volume on Wealth, Debt, and Taxation, the Census Bureau publishes a statement of the revenue receipts for the various civil divisions of the United States for the fiscal year 1901–2. This statement covers receipts from all sources except the sale of bonds, including general property, special property, business and poll taxes, liquor and all other licenses and permits, fines and forfeits, subventions and grants, donations and gifts, interest, special assessments, fees and charges, privileges, industrial income from municipal water, electric, and gas works, etc., and all other unclassified general and commercial revenue receipts. A condensed summary of this statement, which covers nearly 200 pages of small type, gives the following result:



Revenue receipts, fiscal year ending June 30, 1902.

States and Territories	$189,165,067
Counties	199,119,468
Cities over 25,000	424,763,472
Cities, 8,000 to 25,000	75,216,973
All other minor civil divisions	219,304,262
Total	1,107,569,242

For the same year the revenues of the National Government from all sources, including customs, internal revenue, postal revenues, and more than a score of miscellaneous sources of revenue, such as sales of public and Indian lands, profits on coinage, repayments by Pacific railways, tax on national banks, etc., were $684,326,280. Adding this to the amount given above, we get a total of $1,791,895,522. Turning now to the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, we find the gross earnings and income of the railways for that year amounted to $1,922,703,896. A simple operation in subtraction reveals the starling fact, which is also shown graphically in diagram No. 2, that railway receipts for 1902 exceeded the combined revenues of all the civil divisions of the United States, from the Nation down to the township, by nearly $131,000,000.

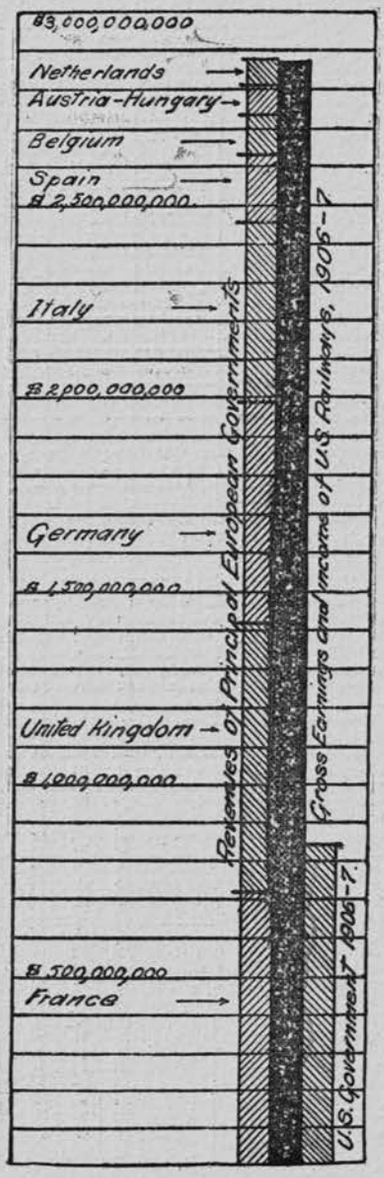
DIAGRAM NO. 2.

Comparative revenues of railways and all governmental divisions of the United States.

Comparative revenues, 1901–2.

United States railways	$1,922,703,896
All civil divisions of United States	1,791,895,522
Excess of railway revenue	130,808,374

Government receipts were in excess of expenditures in 1902, so the total expenditures of all civil divisions were $1,749,485,988. This means that out of the gross earnings and income of the railways for that year there could have been paid all the expenditures of the National Government—legislative, executive, judicial, diplomatic, consular, Army, Navy, post office, etc.; the expenditures of all the States and Territories, including the District of Columbia; those of all the cities, great and small; and those of all the counties, townships, and villages in the country—in short, every payment made for governmental purposes in the whole United States, except those made on the principal of public debts, and there would then have been left a surplus of $173,217,908.



Railway revenues have been increasing more rapidly than national revenues since 1902, but no figures are available for the total revenues or expenditures of other civil divisions. It is of interest, however, to compare the revenues of United States railways with those of some of the principal nations of Europe, as is done in the following table and in diagram No. 3:

Revenues of foreign nations and United States railways.

France, 1906	$715,074,344
United Kingdom, 1905–6	700,666,869
Germany, 1906–7	570,563,137
Italy, 1905–6	470,565,700
Spain, 1906	172,767,678
Belgium, 1906	107,860,738
Austria-Hungary, 1906	72,008,078
Netherlands, 1906–7	71,451,788
Total revenue of Governments named	2,880,958,332
United States railroads, 1906–7	2,875,689,520
Excess of Government revenues	5,268,812

DIAGRAM NO. 3.

Comparative revenues of foreign governments, United States Government, and United States railways.

From this it appears that the total receipts of the railways of the United States for a single year lack only $5,000,000 of equaling the combined revenues of eight of the principal nations of Europe. Diagram No. 3 also shows the receipts of the United States Government for the same year which were $846,725,340. It may be added that the net earnings and income of the railways for that year, after paying all expenses of operation, were $900,567,262, which exceeded the total receipts of the National Government by nearly $54,000,000.

The importance of the transportation question, at least from a financial standpoint, would seem to be fairly well established by the figures already submitted, but so far as we have been comparing governmental revenues with the receipts of a single method of transportation, while there are two more which must receive at least passing notice, viz, transportation by water and by wagon.

From a special report made by the Census Bureau it appears that the amount paid for transportation by water in the calendar year 1906 was $294,854,532. This includes transportation coastwise on the ocean, by lake vessels, and by boats and barges on canals and rivers, but does not include lighterage or other harbor work, nor the amounts paid for ocean transportation to and from foreign ports. Estimates of the latter amount vary from $250,000,000 to $500,000,000. Using the lower figure for the sake of conservatism and adding a little over $5,000,000 for harbor work, we get $550,000,000 as the approximate cost of water transportation for a single year.

When we come to transportation by wagon, statistics are absolutely lacking, and, from the nature of the case, always will be. We must, therefore, use such facts as are available as the basis for an estimate. That which follows claims to be nothing more, but is believed to be conservative. The total amount of freight handled by rail and water in 1907 was, in round numbers, 1,100,000,000 tons. More than half of this tonnage, say 600,000,000 tons, was hauled to and from the railway or the waterway by wagon, and probably a third as much more was delivered to its destination without using either boat or freight car, making a total of 800,000,000 tons moved by wagon. The secretary of the Farmers' National Congress estimates the average wagon haul at 8 miles. The Office of Public Roads of the Department of Agriculture estimates the average cost of wagon transportation at 25 cents per ton per mile. Combining these estimates of tonnage, distance, and cost, we get $1,600,000,000 as the probable cost of wagon transportation in the year named.

If now we add together these various amounts we get the following result:

Transportation taxes in the United States.

Railway transportation, 1906–7	$2, 875, 689, 520
Wagon transportation, 1906–7	1, 600, 000, 000
Water transportation, 1906	550, 000, 000
Total	5, 025, 689, 520

This is considerably more than half as much as the combined revenues of all the nations of the earth, six times as much as the revenues of the United States Government, and more than fifteen times as much as the amount collected by the United States as duties on imports. While based to a considerable extent on estimates, it is believed that these are thoroughly conservative, especially as nothing is included for the transportation of passengers by wagon, and the revenues of electric roads, express companies, and other subsidiary forms of transportation have been omitted.

There are those who claim that the cost of the tariff to the people is not limited to the amount of the duties on imports, since the protected manufacturer is enabled to charge higher prices for his products than he could otherwise obtain. It is not the purpose of this paper either to attack or defend the policy of protection in general or the rates and schedules of the existing tariff law. Nor is it intended to express the opinion that the rates of transportation by any method are higher or lower than they should be. The facts and figures thus far presented have been submitted solely for one purpose, and that is to call attention to the importance of the transportation question and the magnitude, both absolute and relative, of the charges paid for transportation services.

It has been shown that the gross revenues of United States railways are equal to the combined revenues of eight of the principal nations of Europe; that the net earnings of these railways exceed the entire revenue of our National Government; and that if the cost to the people because of the tariff is ten times as great as the duties on imports it must needs be one-half greater still before it would equal the taxes collected in a single year by the various agencies of transportation. It is believed that this showing justifies the contention that the transportation question is one which merits the most careful consideration of the citizenship and the best thought of the statesmanship of the country.

II. THE TRANSPORTATION TRIANGLE.

There are three principal methods of transportation—the highway, the railway, and the waterway, or, as we may call them for the sake of both brevity and alliteration, road, rail, and river—the "three R's" of transportation. These three transportation agencies differ in many important respects. The distinguishing characteristic of the roadway may be called availability; a cart or a pack horse can go where a railroad is a commercial, if not an engineering, impossibility, and the railway can go where no river exists and a canal would be too costly. The distinguishing characteristic of the railway is speed, while that of the waterway is economy. It is said that a horse, or its mechanical equivalent, a horsepower, can move 2 tons at the rate of 3 miles an hour in a wagon on a fairly level road, 15 tons in a car on a railway, and 90 to 100 tons in a boat of proper shape on a waterway of width and depth adapted to its use.

In exact correspondence with these physical facts we find that the estimated cost of wagon transportation on the average road in the United States is 25 cents per ton-mile, which might be reduced to 10 cents on a first-class road; the average rate received by the railroads of the United States in 1907 was 7.82 mills per ton-mile, while the average charge per ton-mile on the goods carried into and out of Lake Superior in that year was eight-tenths of 1 mill. We have as yet no completely improved rivers, but the Army engineers say that when the work now under way on the Ohio River is finished transportation can be conducted thereon for one-half a mill per ton-mile.

Translating these microscopic figures into the language of every-day business, we find they mean that a dollar will carry a ton of freight 4 miles on an average road, 10 miles on a first-class road, 127½ miles on a railroad, 1,250 miles on the Great Lakes, and, if the estimate of the Army engineers is correct, 2,000 miles on a river of the first class when completely improved. From this it is plain that good roads are vastly better than poor roads, but that wagon transportation is too costly for long-distance traffic. Its essential function is the carriage of small loads over short distances. It is equally plain that in economy the waterway surpasses the railway as far as the railway exceeds the highway, and it follows that the essential function of the waterway is the carriage of large loads over long distances. The railway occupies a position intermediate between the highway and the waterway in availability, economy, and essential function.

The truth is that each of the three—road, rail, and river—is an integral and indispensable part of a threefold transportation system, which would be radically defective if any of the three were lacking, and which can only reach the highest efficiency of which it is capable when there is a symmetrical development of all the parts. How shall this development be secured? Since the highway is essentially local in its field of action, it seems proper that the work of highway improvement, and the provision of funds therefor should be left to local or State initiative. The railway, being continental in its field of action and the most important existing agency of both intrastate and interstate commerce, is properly subject to State and national regulation, but it is evidently the intention of the people to leave the construction and operation of railways for an indefinite period under private or corporate control. There remains for consideration the advisability of waterway improvements and the methods and agencies by which such improvement is to be accomplished.

Waterways produce benefits in three principal ways: First, by the direct saving in the cost of goods actually carried by water; second, by the indirect saving through the reduction of railway rates due to the competition of water routes; and, third, by what may be called a creative effect. It is this third effect, which includes and largely depends upon the other two, which it is intended briefly to discuss. There is no better way of determining the effect which waterways will produce than by a study of the results which they have produced; hence some illustrative instances will be cited.

It was the general opinion of business men in the earlier years of the nineteenth century that Philadelphia would be the principal city of the Atlantic coast. As a matter of fact, the population within the present boundaries of Philadelphia was greater than the combined population of New York and Brooklyn up to 1820, and in 1821 Massachusetts rivaled New York in the volume of exports. By 1840 the combined population of New York and Brooklyn exceeded that of Philadelphia by nearly 100,000, and in 1841 exports from New York were nearly three times as large as those from Massachusetts. A history of Philadelphia, published in 1884, says: "Be the cause whatever it may, the fact stands out prominent that, from the completion of the Erie Canal, New York became what Philadelphia previously had been—the commercial emporium of the United States."

Beaten in commerce, Philadelphia sought to maintain her supremacy in manufactures, and for a time succeeded, only to see, a little later, this prize also slip out of her grasp. New York State was hopelessly behind in manufactures in 1830, the value of her product being but $7,000,000 as against $8,000,000 for Connecticut, $11,000,000 for Pennsylvania, and $63,000,000 for Massachusetts. Ten years later New York had advanced to first rank with products valued at $96,000,000 against $74,000,000 for Massachusetts, and $64,500,000 for Pennsylvania.

But the objection may be made that, even if the Erie Canal were the sole cause of these changes, this all happened before the coming of railways. That is true, but it is to be noted that the coming of the railway has not deprived New York of the lead she gained before its arrival; she held the first place in 1830, and has held it ever since. In 1900 New York, including Brooklyn, was supreme not only in commerce, but in manufactures, the value of goods made being $1,371,358,468, which was far greater than the product, not only of any other city, but of any State in the Union except New York or Pennsylvania. But let us pass to an instance which happened after railways were well established.

The first railway came to Manchester, England, in 1830, and many others came later. Situated only 50 miles from Liverpool, one of the greatest ports of the world, and surrounded by abundant supplies of coal, the city and its immediate suburbs had grown by 1881 to a population of more than 500,000, and had become the seat of great manufacturing enterprises and the chief center of the cotton-spinning industry. One of the most dreadful of all diseases is leprosy, in which the flesh and bones slowly rot and slough away, leaving a ghastly wreck more hideous than death. In the early eighties Manchester seems to have been attacked by what might well be called industrial leprosy. Many mills and factories were closed and some were moved away. Block after block of stores and warerooms were empty and more than 5,000 houses stood tenantless. It was evident that some remedy must be found if the life of the city was to be saved.

Twenty years later a marvelous transformation had been wrought. The silent mills and factories were humming with industry, and scores of new ones as well. All the vacant houses, stores, and warerooms were again in use, and 20,000 new ones had been built and occupied. To-day Manchester, with its suburbs, has a population of nearly 1,000,000, and is the nearest port for a district occupied by 8,000,000 busy, prosperous people. The cause of the disease was costly transportation, and the remedy which worked this modern miracle, bringing growth and life in the place of decay and death, was a ship canal.

But it may be objected that the ship canal made Manchester an ocean port, while the main question in the United States is the advisability of improving our interior waterways. Then let us go over into the heart of Germany, far from the sea and more than 20 miles from the Rhine, to the banks of a little, shallow river called the Main. Founded by the Romans about A. D. 150, in after years the residence of Charlemagne, Frankfort, by the slow growth of centuries had reached a population in 1880 of some 140,000. Something happened to make a wonderful change in the rate of growth, for Frankfort gained more in the next 20 years than in all the centuries before, and to-day, with the suburbs which lie close around her borders, has a population of nearly 500,000.

The "something" that happened was the canalization of the river, completed in the fall of 1886, which made the Main a part of the Rhine navigation system, and which, while it did not allow ocean vessels to come direct to Frankfort, did enable that city to ship goods all the way by water to or from any port on all the seven seas. The locks have since been lengthened and other improvements made, so that much larger boats can use the river, and Frankfort, which spent some $2,000,000 back in 1886 to equip her harbor, is now spending $17,600,000 on a new and greater harbor to properly care for her swiftly growing trade.

But it may be objected that this is an isolated and exceptional case, for the chronic objector is always in evidence—especially when the improvement of waterways is proposed. Then let us broaden our view to include not only the whole of Germany, but also Holland and Belgium, for these three countries belong together geographically and commercially, although politically separate. They occupy so large a place in the world's activities that it is hard to realize how small they are in area. Holland and Belgium together are almost exactly the size of West Virginia. Take the combined area of the three and lay it down on the State of Texas and there would be enough territory left uncovered to make the State of Maine. Their size, as compared to that of the whole United States, is utterly insignificant; how do they compare in other respects—for instance, in foreign commerce?

For the fiscal year 1908 the foreign commerce of the United States—that is, the sum of the imports and exports—amounted to $2,845,044,087. That is a large sum, standing by itself, but it seems to shrink a good deal when put alongside the corresponding figures for the other countries named. For to this sum, large as it is, we must add one billion, two billions, three billions of dollars, and then pile nearly six hundred millions more on top of that to equal the $6,433,347,839 which represents the foreign trade of three little countries which we could lose in one of our States. Germany alone exceeded the United States by $502,000,000, and Holland and Belgium combined exceeded it by over $241,000,000—and it should be noted that these figures do not include the transit trade, but represent imports for consumption and exports of domestic merchandise.

Here are three countries which have only one-thirteenth the area of the United States, a population smaller by 14,000,000, less than half the accumulated wealth, and a soil and climate no better, to say the least. What do they have which we have not, the possession of which may explain this astounding difference in the amount of foreign commerce?

The answer is not far to seek, for in the three countries named the "transportation trinity" is more completely and symmetrically developed than it is anywhere else in the world. They have far better wagon roads than we have and a much greater mileage in proportion to area, although exact statistics are not available on this point. They have a railway system which they claim is adapted to their needs and conditions, although criticized in some respects by American railway men; but they have two and one-third times as much railway in proportion to area as we have, for their 41,200 miles gives them 1 mile of road to each 5.6 square miles of territory, while our 230,000 miles of road (in 1907) gives an average of 1 mile of railway to each 13.1 square miles of area.

Lastly, and most important of all, they have a system of navigable waterways which is not merely unsurpassed, but entirely unequaled elsewhere. According to the Statistisches Jahrbuch für das Deutsche Reich, Germany has 8,545 miles of waterways classed as navigable. But this includes the estuaries of the larger rivers which are used mainly by seagoing vessels, certain canals built partly for drainage purposes, and some small streams which are only occasionally navigated. Omitting these, there are 6,215 miles of important inland waterways which are in constant use. From other official sources we find that Holland has 2,960 and Belgium 1,367 miles of canals and navigable rivers, making a total for the three countries of 10,542 miles of waterways.

If Texas had 150,000 miles of macadamized wagon roads, 47,000 miles of railroad (to say nothing of 10,000 miles of electric and narrow-gauge lines), 12,500 miles of navigable waterways, a population of 87,000,000, and a foreign commerce more than two and a half times as great as that of the United States, it would present a scene of concentrated human activity exactly similar to that which exists in the three countries under consideration.

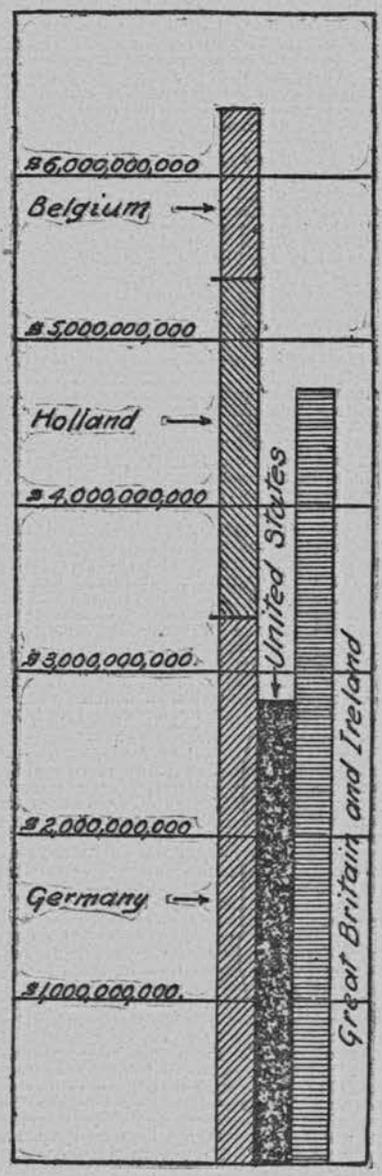
Diagram No. 4 includes, in addition to the foreign trade of Germany, Holland, Belgium, and the United States, that of Great Britain and Ireland, which for 1908 was $4,721,000,000. Many causes have combined to give the United Kingdom a foreign trade which is greater than that of any other country in the world—incomparably greater if area and population be considered—but the foundation on which all other causes rest is the fact that no spot in all the British Isles is a hundred miles from the sea. There is only one other country which has a foreign trade worthy to be compared with that of the nations already named. That country is France, which is almost identical in size with Germany, and had a foreign commerce of $2,063,000,000. And France has 10,350 miles of navigable waterways, of which 7,485 are regularly used.

But the chronic objector insists that conditions are not the same in the United States as in Europe. Doubtless there are differences, but there are also many points of similarity. In Europe the larger cities are on the waterways, and the same thing is true in the United States. By the census of 1900 there were 24 cities which had a population of more than 150,000 each, only one of which was not on a navigable waterway. In Europe the principal manufacturing regions lie along the waterways. In this country the States that touch the lakes rank first, second, third, fifth, eighth, ninth, tenth, and thirteenth in value of products; all the intermediate positions are held by States that touch the ocean, while New York and Pennsylvania, which rank first and second, are the only States which touch both the lakes and the ocean. Turning to cities, we find 22 which reported a product of more than $65,000,000, and again there was but one not on a navigable waterway.

Search where you will throughout the civilized world and you will find this thing to be true—that the largest cities, the densest population, the greatest development of industry and commerce are to be found in those regions which are most abundantly supplied with transportation facilities, and especially with waterways. This is not an accident; the two facts stand related as cause and effect. Supremacy in commerce is not merely coincident with, but consequent upon, economy of transportation. There are three ways which lead to the growth of cities, the development of States, the prosperity of nations—the highway, the railway, and the waterway—and the greatest of these is the waterway.

III. SOME OBJECTIONS CONSIDERED.

It would seem that only one conclusion could be drawn from the facts and figures which have been presented, viz, that the improvement of our waterways constitutes at once the greatest opportunity and the highest duty confronting the people and the Government of the United States. Public sentiment in favor of such action has increased rapidly in recent years. A multitude of organizations have been formed, each of which advocates the improvement of some particular waterway, and all of which are united to form the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, which advocates not a project but a policy. This policy includes the continued development of lake and ocean harbors, the creation of a comprehensive, carefully planned, truly national system of connected waterways, and the provision of the organization, the equipment, and the funds to accomplish this result as speedily as possible.



But there are those who strenuously oppose this program, saying that the present and prospective needs of commerce and industry (except such as are necessarily supplied by wagon roads) can best be met by the further extension and development of railways, and that the expenditure of large sums upon waterways is therefore unwise and unnecessary. The number of articles advocating this line of action which have appeared in newspapers and magazines in recent months is a significant indication of the growth of public sentiment in favor of waterways, and of the existence of some organized interest opposed thereto. It is worth while to examine some of the arguments advanced in support of the claim that the gigantic and vitally important task of transportation shall be entrusted in its entirety to the railways.

It is often pointed out that the Mississippi and other western rivers, which at one time were alive with steamboats carrying both passengers and freight, have lost the greater portion of their traffic, which has been absorbed by the railways. This is held as proof positive that the waterway is outgrown and discredited as an agency of transportation. Mr. Logan G. McPherson in a recent article ("Waterways and railways," Atlantic Monthly, April, 1910) says:

"In the United States the railways demonstrated their superiority not only over the canals but also over the rivers, in large measure displacing even the steamboats for which the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers and their tributaries were famous."

DIAGRAM No. 4.

Comparative amounts of foreign commerce of the United States and certain other nations.

The result is undeniable—how was it accomplished? No. 4 of the "findings" of the Inland Waterways Commission was as follows:

"While the decline of navigation in the inland waterways was largely due to the natural growth and legitimate competition attending railway extension, it is also clear that railway interests have been successfully directed against the normal maintenance and development of water traffic by control of water fronts and terminals, by acquisition or control of competing canals and vessels, by discriminating tariffs, by rebates, by adverse placement of tracks and structures, and by other means."

In the fifth "finding" it is said:

"So large a portion of railway traffic is free from water competition that railways can readily afford to so reduce rates on those portions affected by such competition as to destroy the profits of the water lines without appreciably affecting the profits of the rail systems, which recoup these reductions by higher rates elsewhere."

The following specific instance is given in a report prepared for the Inland Waterways Commission by the Bureau of Corporations:

"The opening in 1883 of the Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Railroad, now known as the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad, an Illinois Central property, went far toward accomplishing the downfall of steamboat traffic on the lower Mississippi. The railroad paralleled the river from Memphis to New Orleans, reaching all the important towns on the east bank of the river. * * * From river competitive points, such as Vicksburg, the rail rate dropped as low as 45 or 50 cents per bale to New Orleans, while from points back from the river, such as Rolling Fork, Miss., about 40 miles from Vicksburg and 10 from the river, the railroad recouped itself by charging $1 to $2 per bale."

Mr. McPherson frankly states, as a matter needing no apology—

"Both in England and in the United States these results were obtained by the railways so reducing their rates to and from places between which they had water competition that the boats could not continue in service. * * * In obedience to primal law, in the struggle for existence there was survival of the fittest."

If the writer hereof should seek out Mr. McPherson and, either by reason of greater strength or the possession of superior weapons, should take his life, that also, just as truly as the other case, would be a survival of the fittest. But in civilized lands the old primal law of "let him kill who can" has been superseded, so far as individuals are concerned, by the law of peaceable cooperation. The fundamental reason for the organization of governments is the protection of life and property. We pay policemen and maintain standing armies to prevent citizens from killing each other off, because it is to the interest of the State that all its citizens shall live and work for the State's upbuilding. It is equally to the interest of the State that all its agencies of transportation shall be maintained and made to contribute to its development. When we shall wake to a realization of this fact, which has long been recognized by the Governments of Europe, laws will be enacted and enforced which will prevent destructive competition between railways and waterways, both of which are essential to our growth and prosperity.

It is also urged that railway rates are so much higher in Europe than in the United States that traffic seeks the waterways in order to escape the intolerable burden which those rates impose. Mr. George G. Tunell, in a report to the Chicago harbor commission, says:

"The average freight rate per ton-mile on the United Prussian and Hessian State railroads during 1906 was 13.41 mills, while the average rate in the United States was but 7.48 mills."

That is one of the finest examples in existence of a statement which is absolutely true, but which, standing alone, leads to a conclusion absolutely false. The rate per ton per mile is a convenient generalization which has a place and a use in the discussion of transportation questions, but we must know the services performed as well as the charges made before we can decide which of two rates is the more economical.

Two reports on American railways have been made in recent years by expert German investigators, one by Mr. G. Franke, published in the Archiv für Eisenbahnwesen, the other by Messrs. Hoff and Schwabach, who were especially commissioned for the purpose by the Prussian Government. These keen-eyed, competent observers point out a large number of differences in the basis on which the statistics are compiled, which differences make a bare comparison of the average rates per ton per mile entirely misleading.

The cost of loading and unloading freight and other terminal expenses is the same whether the haul be short or long, hence the ton-mile rate decreases with length of haul—and the average haul of traffic on the Government roads of Germany, considered as a system, was, in 1905, only 78 miles, while in this country on all railways, considered as a system, the average haul was three times as great, or 244 miles. It might almost be said that in Germany all traffic is local traffic.

The average rate per ton-mile on American railways is greatly depressed by the circuitous routing of traffic. In the final report of the Industrial Commission examples were given showing that large amounts of freight are sent by roundabout routes which are from 60 to 250 per cent longer than the shortest available lines. Nothing of the kind is done on German roads.

* * * * * * *

One of the most vital differences pointed out by these German observers is the fact that a large amount of freight which in the United States is handled by fast freight, private car, and refrigerator car lines, is handled in Germany by the railways direct. In Germany, therefore, the statistics represent the total price paid for the service, while in this country they represent not what the public pays to the private-car lines, but the much smaller amount which these latter pay to the railways over which they operate.

Furthermore, the class of business which is carried in this country by express companies is divided in Germany between the fast-freight service operated by the railways and the parcels post. No figures are available from which to calculate the average charge per ton-mile on the traffic carried by express companies in the United States, but the published tariffs show rates on general merchandise running as high as $1 per ton-mile for short distances. That is about the highest rate published for the territory east of the Mississippi River, and the average is no doubt much nearer to 10 or 12 cents than to the higher figure, but it is a matter of common knowledge that express rates are very much higher than freight rates, there being, of course, a difference in the service also. The occasional distribution of stock dividends of 200 per cent and cash dividends of 28 per cent additional is a further indication of the difference between the amount collected by the express companies, which is a part of the transportation taxes paid by the American people, and the amount received from the express companies by the railways and reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Our railways charge the Government much more for the transportation of mail matter than they charge the express companies for the transportation of express matter in the same trains. In Germany one postal car on every train, with all its contents and the clerks in charge, is carried absolutely free, and any additional cars are hauled for a charge of from 8 to 12 cents per car for each mile run. It is interesting, not to say instructive, to compare express rates in the United States with parcels-post rates in Germany, where a package of 11 pounds weight can be sent to any point within 46 English miles for 6 cents and to any point in the Empire for 12 cents, and packages are accepted up to a maximum weight of 110 pounds.

Three different classes of rates enter into the making of the average rate per ton-mile—local rates (usually high), through rates (with which are included rates to points having water competition), which are much lower, and foreign rates, which are the lowest of all. The German commissioners found numerous cases where local rates in this country were four to five times as much as rates for similar service in Germany.

Many things, such as the fact that terminal costs are the same irrespective of the length of haul, justify a charge per ton-mile which is less for long hauls than for short hauls, but the Germans, owning both their railways and their waterways, make equal charge for equal service on their railways whether the lines are near to or remote from waterways, which is the exact reverse of American practice. In fact, German rates in some instances are so fixed as to induce the movement of heavy articles of small value, such as coal and ores, by water instead of by rail, so that the rail lines may be free to give prompt movement to traffic of a higher class. The total traffic of the German railways in 1905 was 27,652,000,000 ton-miles. If it had been possible for them to haul, in addition to this, the 9,300,000,000 ton-miles of low-grade traffic carried on the German waterways, the average railway rate per ton-mile would have been largely decreased, but the transportation taxes of the German people would have been a good deal higher than they were.

Foreign rates also are arranged upon a different basis in the two countries. Rates on oranges from California to New York are made exactly equal to the sum of ocean freights and import duty on oranges from the Mediterranean, and when Congress recently increased the duty on lemons the railways immediately raised the freight rate. It costs less to ship pottery products to Iowa from Liverpool, England, than from East Liverpool, Ohio, and only 5 cents a hundred pounds more to send plate glass from Antwerp, Belgium, to Denver than to send it from St. Louis to the same city. A few months ago the transcontinental roads went out of the export business rather than make known their proportionate share of the through rate.

German railways also make a difference between domestic and export rates, but the rates are public and are designed to support the national tariff rather than to nullify it—to make it easy for the German manufacturer to bring in his raw material and send out his finished product and hard for the foreigner to compete with him in his home market. The Government-owned railways of Germany are operated primarily to promote the development of the nation; the privately owned railways of the United States are operated principally to produce dividends.

Commissioners Hoff and Schwabach, after a careful investigation, reported that when proper allowance is made for express, mail, company freight, private car line traffic, etc., when what the German public gets from its railways is weighed up along with what we do not get from ours and the figures are calculated on the basis of prices paid for the same service, a true statement of the average freight rates would be 14.4 mills per ton-mile on the railroads of the United States and 9.5 mills on those of Prussia.

The average passenger rate in Prussia is 0.98 of a cent per mile as against 2.014 cents in the United States. The Prussian passenger service has been criticized by American railway men—whether justly or not it is not intended here to discuss, except to say that it is undoubtedly about what the German people want, for nowhere else in the world do the people have so large a voice and so direct an influence in determining the character of railway service and the rates charged therefor as they have in Germany. But there is one important point in which their service is incomparably superior to ours, and that is in safety, for our railways kill more people every fortnight on the average than the Prussian railways do in a year.

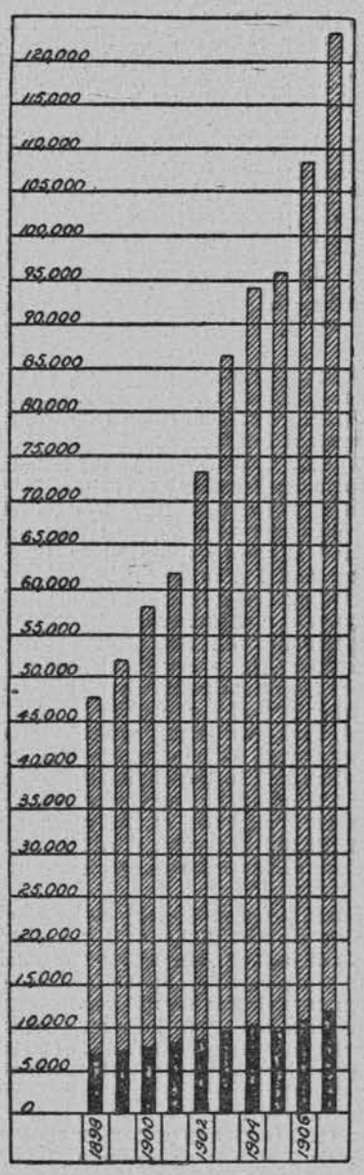
Diagram No. 5 shows, for the fiscal years 1898 to 1907, inclusive, the number of deaths and injuries reported by the railways of the United States to the Interstate Commerce Commission. From this it appears that the number of casualties sufficiently serious to be reported has mounted steadily higher year after year. For 1907 the figures were 11,839 killed and 111,016 injured, a total of 122,855. This grim total is equivalent to 33 persons killed and 304 injured for every day in the year. A statement recently issued by the bureau of railway news and statistics indicates a gratifying decrease in the number of passengers killed in 1908 and 1909, but official figures are not at hand from which to determine whether there has been a similar decrease in deaths and injuries of employees and others.)

The German roads, with 32,000 miles of line in 1905, had about one-third as many employees and hauled about one-half as much freight as did the American roads with their 214,000 miles of line. The German roads, however, carried nearly 185,000,000 more passengers than the roads in the United States. In spite of this tremendous difference in relative density of traffic the official figures show that in proportion to the number of passengers carried and employees at work in that year the railways of this country killed 6½ times and injured 29 times as many passengers, and killed 3 times and injured 25 times as many employees as the roads of Prussia.

Many things contribute to the safety of travel on Prussian railroads, a prominent factor being the number of men employed for the especial purpose of preventing accidents. The German commissioners already quoted say that if American railways were as carefully guarded as are those of Prussia we would have 636,000 men employed for that purpose, while the number actually employed (in 1905, when their investigation was made) was less than 50,000. The people of the United States could well afford to pay a higher rate per ton-mile for their freight if they could not only travel for less than half the present rates, but could also know that when they do travel, the danger of getting killed would be only about one-seventh, and of getting hurt about one-thirtieth, as great as it is now—or, to be exact, as it was in 1905.

There is one other point which must not be omitted in this effort to get at the real meaning of the average rates per ton-mile reported for the two countries, and that is the tremendous difference in the contributions to governmental revenues. The German railway system is decidedly a solvent institution. In 1907, after paying for maintenance, operation, repairs, renewals, new equipment, local taxes, interest on bonds, contribution to the sinking fund, and every other item which the careful German accounting required to be deducted, there remained an absolutely net profit of $164,000,000. Since the German roads are practically all owned and operated by the States, this handsome amount went into the State treasuries. The amount paid in taxes to subordinate political divisions was about $5,000,000 more, making a total contribution to governmental revenues of $169,000,000.

This is considerably more than twice as much as the amount paid in taxes by American roads in the fiscal year 1907, which was $30,108,006. The difference becomes still more striking when we take into consideration the much greater mileage of the American lines, for if these latter had paid as much per mile of line as did the German roads, they would have contributed to the treasuries of the States, cities, counties, and other minor civil divisions of the United States not $80,000,000, but more than $1,110,000,000.



If the net profits of the German roads had been used solely for that purpose, the railway debt would before now have been paid in full, with interest, leaving the entire system with its equipment as a net asset in the hands of the German States. These chose rather to put the proceeds of the transportation taxes into their treasuries, reducing by that much the amount to be raised by other forms of taxation. During the 25 years that the German railways have been owned and operated by the States of the Empire, the mileage has been nearly doubled, the equipment considerably more than doubled, and the efficiency of the system increased at least threefold. Both passenger and freight rates have been reduced, but profits on the capital invested have risen from 4.9 to 7.52 per cent, while the net income per mile of line operated was $5,050 in 1907 as against $1,976 on American roads.

Between 1890 and 1907 the railways of the United States increased their capitalization by $13,020 per mile of line; between 1883 and 1902 the German railway system, besides paying for itself in net profits, reduced its capitalization by $2,527 per mile. It is not claimed that the German railway system is perfect, and the writer is most emphatically not an advocate of Government ownership and operation of railways in the United States. But there would be a good deal to say in favor of a railway administration which could accomplish the results outlined above, even if its average freight rates per ton per mile were actually, instead of only apparently, higher than those on the railways of the United States.

DIAGRAM No. 5.

Deaths (in black) and injuries on United States railways 1898–1907, as reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

A number of recent writers evince surprise, not unmixed with sorrow, because the governments of the earth, as a rule, collect only insignificant tolls for the use of canals and no tolls at all for the use of improved rivers. Mr. McPherson, from whom quotation has already been made, states that the results of this policy are shown by "statistics that are startling." Concerning one of several instances referred to by him, he says:

"The revenue from the interior waterways in 1905 was over $2,300,000 less than the expense for maintenance. If there be added thereto interest on the capital at 3½ per cent, amounting to $4,637,750, it is found that the charge borne, without offset, by the State of Prussia during 1905 for its interior waterways amounted to nearly $6,500,000."

Belgium, Russia, and other countries are also referred to and the charges are given which are borne, "without offset," for the maintenance of waterways.

Apparently nothing is to be considered as an offset but a direct return in cash through tolls or charges, but if this be the true basis for calculation the governmental expenditures which are totally "without offset" are both many and large. For instance, there was spent last year on the public-school system of the United States about $400,000,000. Since no charges were made for the education given, this large expenditure must have been "without offset." (Was this not also a flagrant example of unfair competition by the Government with schools maintained by private enterprise?) Something might be said also concerning the expenditures made, not by the Government but by the people, for the maintenance of churches and other religious institutions, but it is better that our attention should be confined chiefly to matters connected with transportation.

Canals and rivers are not the only highways for the use of which no tolls are charged. We have in the United States about 2,250,000 miles of public roads. If the land contained therein, which is somewhere between 13,000,000 and 15,000,000 acres, is worth as much as the lands adjacent thereto, its total value may be roughly approximated as $150,000,000. But Bulletin No. 32, issued by the Office of Public Roads, states that the expenditures on public roads in 1904 were $80,000,000, in round numbers, which is equivalent to 4 per cent on $2,000,000,000.

Then there are thousands of miles of streets in the cities, towns, and villages of the country. Some of these are bordered by real estate so valuable that the income of the average citizen for a year would be too little to buy a square foot of it. Many are paved with materials of various kinds, most of which are costly—some of them, sometimes, unnecessarily so. Some of them are cleaned every day, and some are tended day and night by a force of white-suited employees who sweep up every bit of litter as fast as it falls. Here is land which would readily sell for billions of dollars in cash, the use of which for any productive purpose is positively prohibited.

No figures are available as to the amount which has been spent on the improvement of streets, alleys, and roads in this country, but it must be enormous. If we could get at the annual cost of maintenance of all the city streets and country roads in the United States, and add to that the interest at 4 per cent on all that has been expended on their improvement, the sum total would mount up to scores of millions of dollars. And since almost every mile of highway is free of tolls, this vast expenditure is entirely "without offset."

Vast quantities of lands have been granted to aid the construction of railroads in the United States. In Louisiana one-ninth, in California one-eighth, in Nebraska one-seventh, in Wisconsin, Iowa, Kansas, North Dakota, and Montana one-fifth, and in Minnesota and Washington no less than one-fourth of the total area was donated for this purpose. The area of the lands granted by the National and State Governments is equal to that of the 13 original States and greater than the area of Germany and Italy combined, or of France, Great Britain, and Belgium. The value of these lands at the time they were granted was probably not less than $500,000,000.

In addition to this imperial domain, other large amounts of land were given by counties, townships, cities, and individuals. The Northern Pacific was built into Superior, Wis., in consideration of a free right of way, which was so chosen that it took most of the water front, and a deed to "one-third of all lands, premises, and real estate." This was not an extreme case. During the eighties, when railroad building was most active in the Dakotas, the usual terms exacted from the owners of town sites included free right of way and station grounds and a deed to every alternate lot. The areas of these lands was, of course, much smaller than that of the lands granted by Congress and the States, but the value was probably as great.

Besides these grants of land, enormous both in area and in value, our railways have received financial assistance from sources ranging from the National Treasury down through States, counties, and cities to pioneers striving to carve out homes in the forests or turn the prairies into farms. At one time the Pacific railways were indebted to the Government for bonds and unpaid interest in the sum of $130,000,000, but all but about $6,000,000 has since been paid. Another $6,000,000 was contributed in rebates in the tariff on imported rails. No complete compilation of the figures has ever been made, so we must be content with indications and estimates. The net amount contributed by the State of Missouri was $25,604,344, and towns and counties in the same State gave $8,124,075 more. Two hundred and ninety-four cities, towns, and villages in New York gave $29,978,206, and 51 counties in the same State gave from $5,000 to $3,000,000 each. In 1853 Wheeling had a railroad debt of $1,100,000; St. Louis, $2,500,000; New Orleans and Pittsburgh, $3,500,000 each; Baltimore, $7,830,000; and Philadelphia, $8,154,000. The census of 1870 showed that there were still outstanding $185,000,000 of county bonds issued in aid of railroads.

Of other grants to railroads space remains for the mention of but two. One is the exemption from taxation at the same rate as other property. The taxes paid by railways in 1907 were less than one-half of 1 per cent on the capitalization. It follows that one of two things is true—either the roads are very heavily capitalized or very lightly taxed. The other item is composed of the franchises granted by States and cities. Rivers run by authority of Almighty God, but railways must be chartered by human governments. It is impossible to ascertain either what existing railway franchises were worth when granted, or what they are worth now, but it is interesting to speculate how much the companies would pay for the privilege of continuing to operate, if, through some inconceivable legislative foresight, it had been arranged that all these franchises should terminate on December 31, 1911.

As is natural when exact figures are lacking, estimates vary widely as to the aggregate value of all the gifts, grants, lands, bonds, exemptions, and franchises which have been given in aid of railways. Some put it as low as $2,000,000,000; others say that fully half of the $17,000,000,000 of railway capitalization is based upon donations made and franchises granted by Government and people. Take the lower figure and put the interest at 4 per cent, although the current rate was much higher when many of the gifts were made, and the expense amounts to $80,000,000 a year. And since the railways have paid no rental for the lands and no interest on the money given them, this expense, which has already been running for 50 years or more, is entirely "without offset."

But the reductio ad absurdam is probably sufficiently complete. In founding and sustaining schools and churches, in laying out, improving, and maintaining streets and roads, in giving franchises to railways and adding enormous grants of lands and bonds to aid in their construction, Government and people were seeking not dividends, but development.

"Without offset" indeed! Some of the Pacific roads may have been so lavishly endowed that the value of the gifts was far greater than the cost of construction. Some roads may have been built for the sole purpose of blackmailing existing lines. But who can estimate or comprehend even the money value of the development which has come with, and largely because of, the building of railways? Who, until the coming of that poet greater than Homer, who shall write a poem grander than the Iliad, the epic of America, may fitly characterize the results which the railway has produced in higher realms—the cementing of national unity, the increase in human efficiency, the multiplication of opportunities, the broadening of mental horizons—results beyond the power of money to measure?

Equally is it true that the governments of the earth, in making large expenditures for the improvement of rivers and the construction of canals have been influenced by considerations far higher and have sought results much more far-reaching and important than the earning of dividends through the collection of tolls. A British royal commission has recently been studying the question of canals and inland navigation. Mr. W. H. Lindley, the distinguished engineer who made a comprehensive report to this commission on the waterways of the Continent, gives, among other things, statements showing the charge per ton-mile borne by the State on the traffic carried by water. A number of writers have made these statements the basis of elaborate arguments against waterways. Mr. Lindley also made some other statements, which, if they have seen, these writers have certainly not quoted. In his opening summary he says:

"The opinion on the Continent as to the value of waterways is best shown by the steps proposed and the moneys granted by the governments for their future improvement and development."

In the portion of his report devoted to Germany he says:

"The opinion existing in Germany on the value of waterways for handling the traffic in conjunction with the railways is given by the fact that the Prussian Landtag, on April 1, 1905, sanctioned a law for new works for a total amount of £16,728,750 ($81,469,012.50), or for a sum equivalent to over 60 per cent of the total sum hitherto spent on the waterways in Prussia."

In the fourth and final report of the royal commission there are repeated statements of a similar character. Referring to the Belgian waterways, it is said:

"The State expects no return or profit upon the money spent upon construction or large improvement. It is considered in Belgium, as in France, that these works will increase the commerce and wealth of the nation, and that the increase of commerce and wealth will strengthen the national public revenue."

The commission says, further:

"That the use of the improved natural and artificial waterways in cheapening the transport of coal and other low-value traffic has increased the trade, industry, and wealth of Germany, and so indirectly the revenue derived by the railways from passenger traffic and higher class goods; * * * and the state revenue at the same time benefits indirectly through the increased real income and spending power of the population consequent on the augmented industrial prosperity produced by cheap water transport."

The royal commission also calls attention to another point which our American writers seem to have overlooked. If the Prussian railways and waterways be taken together as parts of one great transportation system, the net revenue in 1905, after paying all costs of maintenance and operation and deducting interest on the capital, was $159,039,151.70. This gave, in addition to all indirect benefits, a net income of more than 7 per cent on the total investment. In the United States that same year railway stocks to the amount of $2,435,370,337, being 37.16 per cent of the total, paid no dividends at all, and the average rate on those stocks which did pay dividends was 5.78 per cent.

IV. WHITHER THE SIGNBOARD POINTS.

The conclusions reached and the recommendations made by the royal commission of Great Britain and Ireland are not without interest and significance to the people and the Government of the United States. That commission was appointed to seek a remedy for the depression in British trade and industry, which is especially evident in the Midlands, once the greatest manufacturing region in the world. One great factory after another has left its former location, which at most was only 85 miles from a harbor, and sought a new location on the seacoast. This was not a matter of choice, but of compulsion, for the owners found themselves not only beaten in the markets of the world, which they once had dominated, but even shut out of the market of London, only 100 miles away, by manufacturers in the heart of Germany, 500 miles farther away, but with water transportation available all the way.

The Royal Commission studied the canals and inland navigations of the Continent and found a great, connected waterway system, with channels which have been continually deepened, widened, and improved so that they could accommodate larger and larger boats and carry an ever-increasing traffic. They found the valleys of these streams sown thick with thriving industries and filled with prosperous cities, some of which, as Frankfort did, grew more in one brief score of years after the coming of the waterway than in a thousand years before. And as a natural, inevitable, and invariable result they found in every country visited that the busiest and most profitable railways were those which lay closest to and cooperated most fully with the waterways.

They studied the canals and inland navigations of Great Britain and Ireland and found, not a system, but a jumbled collection of odds and ends of waterways, no two sections having the same width and depth; all of them too narrow and too shallow for modern needs; most of them unimproved since 1830; all of them strangled by obstructions; some emasculated by adverse railway control of strategic sections; some lying derelict and abandoned, crushed by unfair railway competition. They found, not growth of trade and industry, as on the Continent, but decay, as told in a preceding paragraph, and, as a natural and unavoidable consequence, a steadily decreasing rate of dividends on railway capital.

But there was one striking exception to the general rule, one bright spot in the gloomy picture, and that was in the vicinity of the Manchester Ship Canal. A brief and imperfect outline of the effect on Manchester has already been given, but it should be said that the six or seven million tons of traffic which have been developed at this new-made port were not stolen from Liverpool. That city, with the object of holding the trade built up through centuries of effort, made repeated reductions in its dock and harbor dues. In spite of these reductions—possibly, in part, because of them—her traffic grew faster than ever, so that in the 13 years immediately following the opening of the Manchester Canal the revenue of the port of Liverpool increased more than five times as much as during the same length of time preceding that event.

The British royal commission learned from their studies that the influence of no other one thing penetrates so deeply into the very heart of industry and trade as does that of transportation. They learned that in the great race for commercial supremacy the position held by any nation depends chiefly upon the character, the efficiency, and the economy of the transportation facilities with which it is provided, and that in the last analysis national existence depends largely thereon. They learned, beyond all doubt or question, that waterways are creators of prosperity for cities, states, nations, and railways.

They recommend—

That a permanent "waterway board" be created, which shall be made up not of legislators with countless other calls upon their time, but of experts who shall give exclusive and continuous attention to its work.

That this board be empowered to issue bonds to provide the needed capital.

That all the inland waterways of the United Kingdom be acquired as speedily as possible and placed under the control of the board.

That the first step should be the construction, at an estimated cost of about $100,000,000, of two great waterways extending from the Mersey to the Thames and from the Severn to the Humber, lying across the Midlands like a gigantic letter X, with branches which would shorten the routes from north to south and from east to west.

That a comprehensive plan be formed, and carried to completion as fast as funds become available, which shall extend a connected system of modern waterways to every part of Great Britain and Ireland, so that the manufacturers of the United Kingdom may be able to compete on even terms with the manufacturers of the Continent in the markets of the world.

Details differ in our own country, but the same principles apply. Theirs is chiefly a problem of canals, ours chiefly a problem of rivers. (It goes without saying that in both countries there will be continued development of ocean harbors—with the addition in this country of the channels and harbors of the Lakes.) Theirs is a problem of arresting decay, ours a problem of hastening development. But we, the same as they, need the permanent board or commission of experts, the comprehensive plan, the complete, connected system of waterways, and the bond issue, in order that the needed work may be pushed to speedy completion.

The growth of the United States has been wonderful. But that growth is not finished, it is scarcely begun. If we shall have the wisdom and the courage to supplement our magnificent railway system with a splendid system of inland waterways, all the growth of the past will be but as a prologue to the mightiest drama of national development which the world has ever seen. If, by the improvement of our waterways, we make possible the utilization of all the multitudinous resources with which a bountiful Providence has endowed us, it needs no gift of prophecy to foresee the speedy coming of a day when America, dowered with illimitable wealth and girded with resistless power, may stretch forth her hand and say to all the warring tribes of earth, "Henceforth there shall be peace."

S. A. THOMPSON, Richmond, Ind.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I now yield four minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to bring to the attention of the committee the proposition that there is nothing new in this proposed legislation. In the river and harbor act of 1910 it was expressly provided that in all preliminary examinations and surveys authorized in that bill or in any subsequent river and harbor act the investigation should include data regarding the development and utilization of water power for industrial and commercial purposes; so that the Corps of Engineers, in the investigation of the improvement of Black Warrior River, have acted entirely within the law by including in that investigation the development of water power.

This bill simply provides a change in Dam No. 17 heretofore authorized upon that river, which will develop a large amount of water power. It simply provides for an increase in the lift of one dam and in the elimination of two dams higher up; and while the additional cost over the present project is about $150,000, yet, by reason of the revenue received by the Government of $15,000 per annum, which would very greatly exceed the small additional cost, it is really an economical piece of legislation.

This improvement was predicated entirely upon the proposition of improving the navigation of Black Warrior River, and the development of water power was entirely incidental. As to whether or not the amount to be charged—namely, $1 per annum per horsepower—is too small, I am not prepared to give accurate information, but it has been stated upon the floor here by gentlemen who have investigated it that it is a fair price.

I can not sympathize with that other criticism of this bill, that it ought to contain a limitation by Congress fixing the price at which the water power is to be sold to consumers. I can not believe that gentlemen understand the danger involved in that suggestion. Whenever a corporation created by the State of Alabama obtains certain property rights from Congress, then the regulation of the exercise of those property rights and the price at which the power shall be sold to consumers is and of right ought to be with the sovereign State of Alabama, and I have no doubt the State has proper laws by which that matter can be regulated to the satisfaction of the citizens of that State. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. I suggest that the gentleman from Illinois use the balance of his time, as all the time on this side will be consumed in one speech.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] who just addressed the committee stated that there was nothing new in this proposition. That is what is the matter with it. There is nothing new in it, and we want to put something new into it. There is something new in the air in the development of these things in the country, and the old ideas in reference to the development of water power must be worked over and have something new put into them.

This bill as it stands proceeds upon the old idea. We have reached a point in the country where, with the development of electric power through water power, the National, State, and local Governments must exercise control over the conditions under which the power is generated and sold.

This bill would have passed without controversy in Congress 20 years ago; it would have passed without much discussion 10 years ago; and it might have passed in its present form 5 years ago; but, in my opinion, it can not pass this House in the shape that it is now in. [Applause.]

We are working on this bill not merely with reference to this proposition, but with reference to the lines upon which Congress will grant power such as is proposed to be granted here. We are considering the question whether, where we create power, we will give it away or sell it at a nominal amount, without any control over the price which shall be charged for it, or without giving any other company or person an opportunity to bid to us for its use. I propose at the proper time to offer amendments to the bill for consideration of the committee and the House, so that in this bill, if possible, the House may express its opinion as to the terms upon which the Government shall grant the use of the water power which it creates by the expenditure of its own money.

Mr. KOPP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. KOPP. What does the gentleman think of the proposition enunciated by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL]—that the sovereign State of Alabama has the power to regulate rates under this franchise granted by the Federal Government?

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing that they should exercise that power, if they have it. I want to have somebody representing the Government given the right to fix the maximum charges which can be made to consumers. If the State of Alabama wishes to lower those rates, it is none of my business, and I am perfectly willing.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois if the War Department does not now, under its authority, sell or lease some of these water powers created on navigable streams where locks and dams are put in?

Mr. MANN. My recollection is that on the Cumberland River in Kentucky the water power created by the Government is leased, and it may be in some other places.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. If the gentleman will yield to me for a brief statement, I want to call attention to what the department held in regard to leasing the water-power rights of dams that were put in by the Government in the White River in Arkansas.

At Batesville, Ark., a few years ago a power company desired to purchase the privilege of utilizing the water power created by this dam, which had been built for the purpose of improving navigation. I went with some of my associates to the War Department to intercede in behalf of this company, and they wanted to charge $10 per horsepower. We explained it to them, and they agreed to let that company utilize the power for $5 per horsepower, provided they would pay for the entire amount of water power produced by the dam; that is, its entire capacity. The company was willing to pay $5 a horsepower for what they used, but they were not willing to pay for the entire amount that might be produced by overflow of the dam. So they did not agree. It seems to me that this bill provides a very low price for horsepower.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman understands that at Batesville, White River, the company went to no expense whatever; the Government did it all.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes; absolutely all.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Here this company is going to expend—I do not mean for machinery—but it is going to put into dams $1,700,000 before they can start. At White River they spent nothing at all.

Mr. MANN. After all, Mr. Chairman, it is a question of principle in determining these things. There ought to be somebody given the power on behalf of the Government to fix the rates which shall be paid from time to time.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY. May I inquire of the gentleman whether or not a simple amendment to substitute for the word "shall," in line 23, page 11, the word "may" will meet that very situation?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it would or not; I have not the time to look at it now. I have an amendment which I am sure will meet it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to my colleagues, as a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, that we made an earnest effort to find what was a fair charge for rent in this particular case. We applied for information to the Government engineer who is in charge of that district, an able man, and here is his reply, which will account for the charge of $1 per horsepower. He says:

> In considering the rate of charge and the time-element features of this bill the department has been governed somewhat by a consideration of the fact that it is undoubtedly to the interest of the Government and the country that the water power be developed; that the development is located in the heart of a coal region where steam power is cheaply produced; that the Government will obtain a suitable improvement for navigation more cheaply in the long run if the improvement is combined with water-power development; and that if the terms of the cooperation are made too onerous the company might refuse to enter into contract, the Government thus losing the advantage of decreased ultimate cost and the water power being perpetually wasted. A telegram received from Maj. Flagler relative to the rate of charge provided in this case states:
> "One dollar rental horsepower, my letter May 3, is believed to be high and is based on price stated in bill, and apparently satisfactory to power company. One dollar capitalized at 5 per cent represents $20 increase on first cost of installation of power plant per horsepower over free water power, which I consider high for available horsepower and construction costs on Black Warrior as determined by me."

He further says:

> Power Co.'s estimates are doubtful as to market price of power developed, and amount available, dollar price, is based on assumption that all additional costs of power installation are borne by company.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. As soon as I finish this.

Mr. RAKER. It is just at that point that this is applicable. I find the statement here from the major of the Corps of Engineers in the report, pages 25 and 26, the following:

> It appears to be established that for commercial success water power must be furnished at a first cost not exceeding $100 per horsepower, and it is very doubtful in my opinion if even $514,000 would cover the cost of a power installation, transmission lines, and distributing plant, and also capitalization of such annual rental as may be required by the United States. A representative of the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co., which is endeavoring to secure power rights at these locks, informs me that a market for electric horsepower can be secured as high as $50 per annum per horsepower.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Go on further and see what he says. Read two or three lines further.

Mr. RAKER (reading):

> On this basis the water power developed might prove a commercial success, but the figure stated is surprising.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. It is surprising to him to have it said that a market for electric power can be secured as high as $50 per annum per horsepower. His opinion upon investigation on the ground is that $20 per horsepower is high in that locality.

Mr. MADISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. After I have finished reading this letter.

Mr. MADISON. It is directly in connection with what the gentleman from California stated. It is a fact, however, whatever the estimate of the Government engineer is upon the value of this horsepower, that the Birmingham Water Power & Light Co. through its representative did say that it could sell that horsepower for $50 per horsepower.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I do not know that.

Mr. MADISON. Here is the statement made by the Government engineer that a representative of this company told him as a matter of fact that they could sell it for $50 per horsepower.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Yes; and he said that was surprising to him.

Mr. MADISON. Yes; but it does give, does it not, the view of the Birmingham Light & Power Co.?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Yes; it gives their view. Now, the engineer further says:

> At the expiration of the period stated in the bill it will be possible to make a more exact determination of the rate which should be charged, since the construction cost, sale prices, and amount of power developed will then be definitely known.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed by order of the House. The Clerk will now read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I think that the Clerk is reading the original Senate bill and not the House amendment. Is it necessary that the original Senate bill should be read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk is reading the Senate bill that is now before the House.

Mr. SPARKMAN. But he is reading the old Senate bill, and not the bill as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The original Senate bill has to be read, and he is reading it now.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Senate bill as it was originally and as it has been stricken out by the House, be dispensed with, in order that the time of the committee may be saved, and that the Clerk read the House amendment, which is in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the original Senate bill, which has been stricken out in the House amendment, and to read the substitute therefor. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that is the original Senate bill. It has not been stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. That the reading of the original Senate bill be dispensed with, and that he read the amendment, which is in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. If that should be done, and the House should then decline to agree to the substitute offered by the committee, would there be any opportunity then to amend the original Senate bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would be beyond that stage. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read the amendment of the House, which is in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to change the detailed plans and specifications for the construction of Lock and Dam 17, on the Black Warrior River, Ala., so as to increase the height of the pool level over the dam crest of Lock 17 to a height of 63 feet above the pool level of Lock 16, so as to render unnecessary the building of Locks 18 and 19, as now authorized, and so as to provide for the extension of slack water up the Mulberry and Locust Forks of the Black Warrior River to Sanders Shoals and Nichols Shoals, respectively, and for the development of water power.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order. This is one amendment, and must be reported in full.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point is well taken. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. BORLAND (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the Clerk is now reading the substitute for the Senate bill, and is proceeding to read each section of that substitute. If the reading of the entire substitute is completed, will an amendment be in order to any one section?

The CHAIRMAN. It will. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to have prepared such detailed plans and estimates as may be necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act, and he is further authorized in his discretion to suspend operations during his investigations and to enter into supplemental agreements with the present contractors for Lock and Dam 17, providing for the annulment of existing contracts or for their modification so as to cover the work required for the construction of the higher lock and dam, as he may deem most advantageous for the interests of the United States.

SEC. 3. Should the construction of the higher dam at site 17 be found advisable the appropriations and authorizations heretofore made for the cost of locks and dams on the Black Warrior, Warrior, and Tombigbee Rivers, Ala., shall be available for the construction of Dam 17 and such locks as may be necessary to overcome the lift between the pools created by Dams 16 and 17.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War is authorized and empowered to enter into a contract with the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Alabama, its successors and assigns, for the purpose of carrying out the stipulations and performances herein mentioned. It shall be provided in said contract that the company, its successors and assigns, shall have the right to construct, maintain, own, and operate, at its own cost, in connection with Dams and Locks 16 and 17, for a period of 50 years from the time fixed in this act for completion of the works herein authorized, electrical power stations and other structures for the development of water power for industrial and other purposes, and for converting to its own use, benefit, and profit the power developed with the surplus water not needed for lockage, including the right to sell, lease, or otherwise dispose of said power: Provided, That the company shall furnish and deliver, free of charge to the Government, at Locks 16 and 17, all power necessary for the operation of said locks and for the lighting of the Government grounds and houses situated at said locks. The said contract shall further provide for the payment by the company to the Government of an annual rental for its use of the water power developed at Dams 16 and 17. For a period of 20 years the rental shall be at the rate of $1 per annum per horsepower developed, which rate shall be subject to readjustment by the Secretary of War at the end of that period and thereafter at the end of every 10-year period. Payment for the power developed at each dam shall begin one year after the locks and dam at 17 shall have been completed. Beginning with the year 1920, the minimum rental to be paid to the Government by the company shall be on the basis of 15,000 horsepower. The company shall have ingress and egress over Government lands for the construction and operation of its plants and works and the right to use Government lands at or near said locks for the erecting of power houses and appurtenances in connection therewith, subject to regulation by the Secretary of War. It shall be provided further in the contract that the company shall transfer to the Government flowage rights over all lands that will be temporarily or permanently overflowed by reason of the construction of Dam 17. The Government shall have free access to all the books of the company and all other records necessary for ascertaining and calculating the price, rates, and amount of power produced, developed, or sold by the company at said locks and at its storage reservoir. The contract shall further provide that the works herein contemplated, except the storage reservoir at or near Sanders Shoals, on the Mulberry Fork of the Black Warrior River, shall be commenced within one year and that the power-house foundations to be constructed by the company as a part of the dam shall be completed at least as soon as Dam 17. The said company is hereby authorized to construct said storage dam and reservoir at Sanders Shoals in accordance with the act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters, as amended by the act of June 23, 1910: Provided, That the construction of said dam and reservoir shall be commenced within one year after the completion of Dam 17 and shall be completed within 10 years from the date of approval of this act.

THE FREE LIST—MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 11723. An act permitting the building of a railroad bridge across the St. Croix River between Burnett County, Wis., and Pine County, Minn.;

H. R. 8146. An act to construct a bridge across Rock River, at or near Colona Ferry, in the State of Illinois; and

H. R. 4682. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River, at or near Glenhayes Station, in Wayne County, W. Va.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, and had further insisted upon its amendments Nos. 5 and 7, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had further disagreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 8, had asked a further conference with the House, and had appointed Mr. PENROSE, Mr. CULLOM, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. BAILEY, and Mr. SIMMONS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think I can facilitate matters, and I am addressing myself now more particularly to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], if I may be permitted to make a statement here for a minute or two. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for a minute or two.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call from the Speaker's table the conference report on the free-list bill, about which we have just received a message from the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, would not the committee have to rise to do that?

The SPEAKER. The committee has already risen.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but it has risen only informally. I have no objection whatever, but it is easy to move to rise and then to go back into the committee subsequently.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman thinks there is an objection to it, I will wait.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection, if the gentleman wants to set the precedent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would not do it except by unanimous consent. If the gentleman does not think it is proper, I shall wait. I was merely trying to expedite matters.

Mr. MANN. I say that I shall not object, if the gentleman wants to make the precedent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker may lay before the House the conference report on the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, and to consider the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to call up the report of the conferees on the free-list bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report was read.

(For conference report, see House proceedings of Aug. 14, 1911.)

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the amendments so far agreed to in the conference report add "and binders" after the word "harvesters"; strike out, in line 18, page 2, the words "made wholly or in chief value of leather made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight, of cattle of the bovine species, including calfskins," the effect of which is to put on the free list all classes of shoes without limitation; and the balance of amendments are simply changes of phraseology. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Senate has sent back the bill, adding to the clause in reference to beef the following language:

Coming from any foreign country with which the United States has reciprocal trade agreement and which shall admit from the United States, free of duty, cotton, corn, wheat, oats, horses, cattle, and hogs.

It adopted the same langauge which was disagreed to in conference in reference to flour, corn meal, and so forth, and they disagreed to our amendment adding "lemons" after the words "Roman, Portland, and other hydraulic cement and lime." Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to concur in the Senate amendment No. 7 by inserting after the word "corn" the words "not for distillation." As the Senate bill is written to-day, with amendment 7, buckwheat flour, corn meal, and other flours could not be admitted from any country whatever. I understand that the purpose of the Senate in putting this amendment on was to admit flour and meat from Canada and from no other country, but as there is a tax on corn for distillation purposes, if we agree to the amendment without an amendment we would prohibit the importation of flour and meat from anywhere in the world. Now, I regret that the Senate was not willing to admit flour and meat free from all the world, but I recognize the fact that we can not pass this bill if we insist on the House bill. I think it is better for the country to take a half a loaf than no loaf. I think it is better for us to agree that meat and flour shall come in from Canada than not to come in at all, and in order for it to come in from Canada we have to agree to their amendment with an amendment where they insert the word "corn."

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The Senate has insisted upon its amendments and asked for a conference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, as I understand, if we can agree to their amendments without going in a conference it is not necessary for us to agree to a conference.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman desire that the House recede from its other amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I intend to recede because I can not get it. I recognize I can not get it, and when we reach that point I intend to move to recede. I think there is no necessity or us going to conference when we would come out of conference exactly in the position we are now.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. If the amendment the gentleman suggests is now made in the bill would you not have to have a conference?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all, if the House agree to that amendment in reference to the paragraph relating to flour and bread and the amendment relating to meat, lamb, and so forth, and recedes from its amendment in reference to lemons and agrees to the Senate amendment, there would be no occasion to go to conference.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how you expedite anything.

Mr. CULLOP. I understood from the gentleman, though, that as the bill is now written, because of certain language in regard to these products for distillation, they could not be admitted free from any country in the world.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They can not——

Mr. CULLOP. Will it not be amending the bill in that particular so that it will have to go back to conference?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all. The Senate will agree to our amendment, and I understand they will promptly do so, and that they are waiting now for us to send the bill back before 4 o'clock p. m., so that they can send it to the President. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is adopted, will meat and flour come in free to this country from anywhere?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the motion I make is adopted it will come in free from Canada only.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Would the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] be willing to offer a motion which would give the Senate an opportunity to vote upon a question which would in effect permit meat and flour to come in free from any country?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have already done that. When this bill was in conference I stated to the Senate conferees that I would not agree to yield on this point of not having free bread and free meat coming in from the world unless they took the bill back to the Senate and had a direct vote on the question, which they had this morning.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman from Alabama will permit me, I hardly think they have. The bill went to the Senate with this provision, and also had a House amendment relative to lemons. So the question was involved with one as to whether the Senate would concur in the House amendment on lemons or insist upon its disagreement to it. If the House were to recede from its amendment putting lemons on the free list and insist upon its disagreement to amendments 5 and 6, the effect of which would be to permit meat to come in free from any other country, the Senate would then be compelled to vote directly upon that one question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from New York that he does not understand the parliamentary situation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think I do understand it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senate has had a direct vote on this proposition this morning. These points were not included in the conference report. They went back to the Senate, where they could have receded if they wanted to do so, and they refused to recede. They could have receded and adopted the amendment. Now, it is a question as to whether we shall recede or not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If they had done that there would still be in disagreement the amendment about lemons.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the amendment about lemons had nothing to do with the other two paragraphs.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But it would have been asking the Senate to have yielded on an important matter in controversy and yet have left undisposed of, with advantage to the House, the amendment of the House as proposed. The Senate has not yet had an opportunity to vote squarely upon the question of putting meat and bread upon the free list free from other embarrassments.

And, if the gentleman will permit me, I wish to say that Bradstreet's report shows that in the past month the price of foodstuffs has increased 7 per cent. Coming from the section of the country I do, I am vitally interested in having meat and bread and flour coming in free of duty from the world.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say that there is no man in this House more interested in having meat and flour admitted free than I am. I do not think we can get this through the Senate. It was directly presented.

However, I do not care to take up the time of the House. I will withdraw the request and let the matter be taken up at a time when the House can consider it.

BLACK WARRIOR RIVER.

The committee resumed its sitting, with Mr. FERRIS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 943) to improve navigation on the Black Warrior River, in the State of Alabama. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That in the exercise of the authority granted to the company herein or by said contract the company shall conform to such regulations as may be imposed by the Secretary of War for the protection of navigation and of the property and other interests of the United States. The company shall at no time lower the pool level made by the erection of Dam 16, nor the pool level of Dam 17 below 63 feet above the crest of Dam 16, but in order to create a storage surplus for water-power purposes the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, permit flashboards or a removable crest not exceeding 3 feet in height to be installed on Dam 17 by the company, at its own expense; the United States shall not be liable to said company for any failure of water power from any cause whatsoever. The work and improvements herein provided for shall be executed under the direction and with the approval of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War. To insure the performance by the company of the acts and obligations imposed upon it by said contract the Secretary of War may require the company to execute a bond in such an amount and with such surety as he may determine to be necessary. Whenever the company shall have acquired and transferred to the United States Government flowage rights over all lands to be flooded and temporarily or permanently overflowed and shall have erected power stations sufficient to supply the Government with all necessary power to light and operate said locks, said bond may be reduced to an amount not to exceed $50,000.

SEC. 6. All repairs, renewals, and other necessary expenditures upon the works, which the company shall be allowed to construct exclusively for the use of power generation, shall be made by the company, so that their condition shall at no time interfere with the interests of navigation: Provided, That whenever in the opinion of the Secretary of War the condition of said works endangers the interests of navigation, he shall notify the said company to repair the same, and if the company shall not immediately comply with the demand of the Secretary of War to make such repairs, he is hereby authorized and empowered to enter upon such works and cause them to be repaired; and the expense thereof shall constitute a debt against said company, its successors or assigns, and a lien upon all its property.

SEC. 7. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. CULLOP and Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is recognized.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a statement about this bill, and I would like to ask the House to grant me an extension for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, although this bill relates to some extent to my own constituency, I think the Government is far more interested in the bill than either I am or my constituency is, because, as I said the other day, we have five water-power projects on the Coosa River that are capable of development, and one of them is in process of development. We have the greatest water-power project in the United States, next to the Niagara Falls, on the Tennessee River, only 80 miles north of Birmingham; and from 60 miles out of town they are preparing to bring gas into the city where we shall have all the power developed from escaped gas from furnaces and coke ovens, so that we are not materially interested in the development of this water power.

I was interested in the opening of the navigation of the Warrior River to the sea. For 16 years Congress has been at work on that development. In the last Congress they made an appropriation and provided a plan for the final development of that river. It is on the statute books. It does not make a bit of difference whether this bill is passed or defeated. The law will now provide for the opening of the Warrior River, opposite the city of Birmingham, where we can send our coal and our iron to the sea and to the countries of the world at a very much lower freight rate than we have to pay by rail now, and that is the material proposition that my constituency is interested in, and that is the reason why I do not want any delay in the consideration of this bill.

I was not originally in favor of the bill. And why? Because I thought it might delay navigation. The contractor for the building of Lock No. 17 has built a railroad up there, and he has got his machinery and supplies there, and if this bill passes, inside of a week he can go to work building Lock No. 17 on the old plan. Under the new plan he has three more locks to build, and if he builds them he has to build railroads up to them and has to carry his machinery up to them.

Now, he has agreed with the War Department, with which he has already got a contract, to remove this material for $8 a square yard, and he says under this new plan he will take the contract for $7 a square yard, or a reduction of $1 a square yard. The reason I finally consented to this bill is because the engineers and the War Department say that it will save the Government of the United States $257,000 in completing this waterway; and, more than that, they say it will be a decrease of $6,000 a year for each lock, or $6,000 a year each for three locks, which makes $18,000 decrease in the cost of maintenance.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Four locks.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; four. But there is one to be built that they will have to maintain.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. There are five.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I stand corrected. There are five locks contemplated, and it will take $6,000 to maintain the one if you adopt this bill. If you do not adopt it, you will have five to maintain, with all of the machinery connected with them, and it will cost you $30,000 a year to maintain them. That is from the Government standpoint.

Now, gentlemen have said a great deal here about the people's standpoint. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing for you to put on an amendment upon this bill providing that the Government engineers may regulate the price at which this water power shall be sold by the company. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I can not. Now, I am perfectly willing to sell this. I am perfectly willing to have it regulated. I know that the Government engineers can not make a contract with these people unless they give them a chance to get their money back, and the Government engineers will make a contract at a fair and reasonable price, because it is for the interest of the Government, and that is all I have a right to ask, and all you have a right to ask. We must leave it to somebody, and I am perfectly willing to leave it to the Government engineers.

Now, as to the question of regulating the price to the consumers. I have no interest in this company. I did not promote this bill. My constituents are affected. I am not going to do anything to hurt my constituents. I think the greatest danger in this bill is the question whether these men who are trying to get this power can get the money with which to make their construction, because, as I said, they have competition on every hand. But I am perfectly willing, and have been from the beginning, to do what I have stated.

A great deal has been said on the floor here to try to make people believe that somebody was endeavoring to oppress my constituents. I have always tried to protect my constituents. I have sense enough to know that the War Department must agree to a reasonable charge, that will enable these men to get their money back, and they are going to spend $1,700,000 before they build their own plant. The Government gets the benefit of that $1,700,000 before the water power company get anything, and if the War Department wants to get that $1,700,000 they must fix a fair rental value to be paid by the consumer or else you can not get men to put their money into it.

If I understand the matter correctly, the chairman of the committee has been prepared all the time to offer an amendment to this bill providing that the Government engineers may regulate the price at which this water power shall be sold to the consumers. He has been prepared all the time to offer an amendment here to let the War Department fix the price that these men shall pay. That is all there is in it. I have no doubt he will offer these amendments in a few minutes. I think the committee ought to adopt them; and when they are adopted, if you do not pass this bill we will get the navigation anyhow, but you will be throwing away $250,000 that belongs to the United States Government that they can save to-day, and you will be throwing away $24,000 a year of lockage maintenance charges, besides what you throw away that these men would pay to the Government for the use of this water.

Mr. MADDEN. How many locks are there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Five locks.

Mr. MADDEN. I mean at this dam?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. One.

Mr. MADDEN. There are two locks.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MADDEN. No; the gentleman from Alabama is mistaken.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I am going to give this bill my support, and I want to state my reasons very briefly.

This bill comes to the House of Representatives with a unanimous report from one of the strongest and best committees of this body. Then, in the other end of the Capitol, it received the unanimous report of a similar committee. This report contains the recommendation of the Acting Secretary of War of a Republican administration, so that this proposed legislation has the unanimous indorsement of a Republican Senate committee, a Democratic House committee, and of one of the executive departments of a Republican national administration having river improvements in charge.

Beyond that it has the support of the entire Alabama delegation, the State in which this river is located and which directly affects the people of that Commonwealth.

I know something has been said about the regulation of the price of power to consumers. The people of Alabama, through their legislature and their mayor and board of aldermen in the city of Birmingham, where this power will be sold if a market is found, elected and controlled by the people, will not permit the corporation or power company to be oppressive in the sale of this power.

Another very excellent reason that ought to appeal to Members of this House is this: That the Government saves in the improvement of this river more than a quarter of a million dollars in the construction of the needed locks and dams. It will save by a change in the project of improving this river an annual expenditure for the care and keeping of these locks from $24,000 to $30,000 for all time. If it is not granted, you deprive the Government of an annual income of not less than $15,000 for 50 years, or $750,000.

Now, something with reference to the price of power. It has been said that this power could be sold in Birmingham for $50 a horsepower. For 10 years I attempted to have the water power on the Little Tennessee River developed where we had a fall of 152 feet, and there could be a development of 25,000 horsepower. I spent 10 years and hundreds of dollars to find men that would put in that development, even going as far as London and bringing men from foreign lands to look it over. That proposition had the indorsement of three of the ablest electrical engineers in the United States, one of whom was connected with the development of the Niagara River. During that entire time we failed to place the securities, because our proposed site was located in a field that supplied cheap fuel or coal, just as this power is located. We put in the leading manufacturers' plants of the city of Knoxville, and tested five of their plants as to the cost of power in that field, and the least cost was $16 per horsepower. Now, I undertake to say that this company or no other company in the Birmingham field or the Black Warrior River coal field will ever be able to sell a horsepower for more than $25 at the outside.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, here is a local proposition supported by a solid State delegation on a local measure, and as one Member of this House, thinking of the interest of my constituents, I can not stand here and fight meritorious local propositions and then ever have the face to ask the Members of this House to support a local proposition in which my people are interested. [Applause.]

Gentlemen in discussing this proposition have in mind the water-power propositions of the far West, where they are many hundred miles distant from the supply of fuel and where fuel is expensive; but this situation in the Birmingham field is entirely different from that you have in mind and what you have been discussing here.

Here is the South, and God knows I love that section of our country. Alabama gave me birth, and anything that affects that State and its interests appeals to me. This power proposition means much for the development of Alabama. It means cheaper power for the manufacturing interests. I appeal to my colleagues on this side of the House not to stand in the way of the development of the material interest of Alabama. The only people standing in the interest of that material development are our friends on the other side, who insist on reducing the tariff duties on cotton and other goods manufactured in the South. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "provide," line 9, page 11, insert the following:
"That the Secretary of War shall have the power to fix and regulate from time to time the rates which the said company may charge consumers per power, and provided":

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the only criticism of this bill was the fact that it made no provision for the regulation by anybody of the rates which this company might charge consumers of the power which it might develop.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest to my friend from Florida that he modify his amendment and make that light, heat, and power.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. MANN. We want to know how it is modified.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as it is proposed to be modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "provided," in line 9, page 11, insert the following:

Mr. MANN. That does not make English.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It makes English when it is read in connection with what follows.

Mr. MANN. No; it does not. That is the trouble.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What does it make?

Mr. MANN. God only knows. I can not tell, but it does not work with the rest of the bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. In what particular?

Mr. MANN. I will examine it further.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the committee, after considering the criticisms that were made, came to the conclusion that they were perhaps not without some foundation, and we are now seeking to avoid the objections thus raised by Members on this floor by the amendment which has just been read. I can say for myself that I have always been in favor of governmental regulation, not only of rates for power and light and heat charged by power and lighting companies, but I have always been in favor of the regulation by the Government of port and wharfage charges in any port or river developed or improved by the Government. Gentlemen on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors who have been with me for the past several years know that this has been my position, and I have quite recently applied it to the harbor at my own home town by giving power to the Secretary of War to regulate such charges.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, it was not mandatory in language. It said that he shall have the power, but it does not direct him to fix the power. Section 2 provides:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed—to do a certain thing. The gentleman's amendment says that he merely shall have the power.

Mr. SPARKMAN. In response I will say that the Secretary of War and the engineers have usually regarded such language as that as mandatory, and I have no doubt if this bill passes and becomes a law that they will construe it as mandatory, in accordance with the uniform practice followed by the Secretary of War and the engineers in the past.

Mr. COOPER. Yes; but the circumstances are not the same at all. They have construed as mandatory a general provision in an appropriation bill that says that they may expend so and so, but the money is under their charge, and it will not be expended until they are directed. These rates might be fixed by somebody else subject to the revision of the Secretary of War. There should be a provision that no rate should be fixed except in the first instance by the Government.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The committee did not think it was advisable to force him to change the rates from time to time. He may not find it necessary or proper to do it. We thought it was best to leave it in his discretion. If we say that he shall do it, then he may consider himself as directed to make changes where and when none is necessary. The rates may be fixed in the beginning as low as they should be, and if no changes are needed I would not force the Secretary to make them. There may be no complaints at any time against the rates this company may charge, but if there are, and such complaints are well founded, or if for other reasons the Secretary of War may consider that the rates should be changed, he has ample power, if this amendment is adopted, to make such changes from time to time as his judgment dictates.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I suggest to the gentleman at that point that this company in selling its power will make long-term contracts with manufacturers at a fixed rate per horsepower, so that if the Secretary of War is compelled to change the rates constantly or frequently, it might in that way interfere and endanger the very existence of this corporation that has entered into a disposition and sale of its power for long terms with manufacturing plants.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is along the line of the suggestion I was making, and I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

The was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I am not wedded to the language in which that amendment is couched. If language better suited to express the idea can be suggested, I would have no objection, but I would not agree to the use of the word "shall" instead of "may."

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman proposes to insert this proviso on page 13. Is the gentleman sure that becomes a part of the contract?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly; it becomes part of any contract that may be made with the company under this bill. I do not know whether it will actually go in the contract that may be drawn, but it will become a part of the contract by the adoption of this amendment as much so as though it were written into it.

Mr. MANN. I do not agree with the gentleman about that part of it, but I do not see it is necessary to discuss that question. You are providing here that a contract shall be entered into which clearly would be binding upon the company. Now, is this provision to be written into the contract?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The language of the amendment does not suggest that.

Mr. MANN. I know, but will this proviso——

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think it is part of the contract, and so, I believe, would any lawyer here who has given careful consideration to this——

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have no desire, Mr. Chairman, to occupy any further time just now.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss briefly the proposed amendment permitting the Secretary of War to fix rates to consumers. I believe the primary power of the Federal Government in navigable rivers is to improve them for the purpose of navigation, and I believe that it is in the interest of wise conservation that if the Government itself expends a large amount of money in improving a river for navigation and some incidental profit or benefit may arise from that improvement that it ought to be utilized for the benefit of the public and of that particular locality. I think that a bill of this character utilizing the water power from a dam on a navigable river is a wise measure, but it does seem to me that a measure bristling with precedents and new questions of law and new points in regard to Federal power deserves the most careful consideration in this House. [Applause.]

I do not believe that any contract ought to be made with any corporation which may in its operation tend to the creation of an obnoxious monopoly upon the people of any locality, even if at the time the monopoly be created they happen to unanimously favor it. I believe it is the duty of Congress to safeguard the people from monopolistic tendencies, even though those tendencies may not be apparent in the desire for the general improvement in some locality. I do not believe that a right should be granted to a company to have power from a Government dam without regulation, and I do not think there is any dispute here between Members of Congress that the power to regulate charges ought to be lodged somewhere.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If the gentleman will permit, I desire to ask the gentleman, my colleague from Missouri, whether he thinks it desirable to take the power to regulate such charges away from State control and bring it here to Washington and turn it over to the Secretary of War, who is far removed from those people, who knows nothing about local conditions? Does not the gentleman think it better to leave it just where it now is, with each State to regulate, if there is to be any regulation at all, and most of the States have very ample regulations?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I agree entirely with the views expressed by my colleague from Missouri in his interruption. We all agree here that the power to regulate the rates and charges to consumers ought to be lodged somewhere where it can be effectively exercised, but I do not believe a majority of this House believe that it should be lodged with the Secretary of War. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. As a governmental or sovereign power I agree with the gentleman, but this Government has a right to make a contract, as it is authorized there, and has a control of that contract, and it has the right to make the condition that the charges may be fixed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I concede that the Government, having a property right in the dam it constructs, and undertaking by contract to allow somebody to use that dam, for that purpose may affix to the contract such conditions as it chooses not unlawful in character. The Secretary of War, who is supposed to be a military power, should not fix arbitrarily, without appeal, the charges that may be made to private consumers. That might be satisfactory, but in my judgment it would be wholly unsatisfactory. The fixing of rates for public utilities is properly a legislative power and is vested in the State.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. If the Secretary of War has the power to make the contract with the corporation for the installing of the power, has he not also the same right to make in that contract a provision as to what the maximum charge shall be?

Mr. BORLAND. Oh, yes; without doubt, but whether he would have a right to reserve in that contract the power to supervise those charges afterwards would be a very different question altogether. Now, there is no doubt in my mind that as a legal proposition the sovereignty over that water for all purposes except navigation is in the State of Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for an extension of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. And I am gravely in doubt whether it is the intention of this House to fix a precedent that because the Federal Government has expended some money in improving that stream for navigation, thereby the sovereignty of water for all purposes is turned over to the Federal Government. I do not think we intend to fix any such precedent as that. Now, it has been decided in the State of Missouri in the State ex rel v. the Telephone Co. (189 Mo., 93), that the States have power to fix the charges of public utilities.

The only question involved in that case was whether the State could delegate that power to a municipality within the State. A whole line of authorities are cited that the power to regulate the charges of public utilities is in the State.

Now, we know that the State, by granting a franchise to a private corporation, may barter away certain powers. Under the doctrine of the Dartmouth College case it may make a binding contract which can not afterwards be abrogated by State law. It may put itself in a position where it can not regulate the charges of public utilities. I take it if any State corporation comes up here and asks from the Federal Government the use of public improvements, such as a dam, for water power, that corporation ought to be able to show that the State power to regulate the charges as between it and the citizens of the State has been guarded in the franchise or the charter which the corporation holds from the State. There is absolutely nothing of that kind in this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. It can not be put in the bill as a matter of legislation, because that is legislation of the State. But I can assure the gentleman that the constitution and laws of Alabama have fixed it so that corporations authorized by them are subject to the State authorities.

Mr. BORLAND. If that is the case, gentlemen, then there is no need of extending that power to the Secretary of War. If the State of Alabama, as the gentleman from Alabama says, by its constitution reserves to itself this power, and has practically denied itself the power to release corporations created——

Mr. CULLOP. You are dealing altogether there with questions as to whether the corporation is formed under the State law and the franchise is granted by a State statute. Now, here is a power that is granted by Federal statutes, and a different rule applies. Immediately by that doctrine you would raise a conflict between the Federal and State authorities, and the Federal authority would have to prevail.

Mr. BORLAND. I think not. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] will notice that this particular corporation claims to be an Alabama corporation and gets whatever corporate powers and franchises it has to create electric power and distribute it from the State of Alabama.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes, sir; that is true, but the right to exercise this power is granted by a Federal statute, and the Federal laws would control in that matter.

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman from Indiana is correct, then the Federal Constitution could be stretched to the point of creating Federal corporations for the purpose of engaging in the conduct of public utilities in any State.

Mr. CULLOP. No; my doctrine does not go that far. Here is an express statute that we are about to pass, if we pass it at all, that grants certain privileges to a corporation in a State, and that State will not have control over this Federal statute.

Mr. BORLAND. There is a very serious conflict of opinion between the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Indiana. One states that the State of Alabama has plenary power over the company favored by this legislation in its dealings with its consumers, while the gentleman from Indiana says the Federal Government has the power to grant a franchise for a dam in that State and that it is within the control of the Federal Government. That being so, whether you assume one of these views to be correct or the other, you are setting here a precedent for the use of navigable streams in all the States of the Union. I believe that the true rule will be established and ought to be established—that the Federal Government shall deal with these people as——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I would like about two minutes more. I do not want to trespass unduly upon the time of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] asks unanimous consent to be allowed to speak for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the true rule that ought to be established is this, that the Government ought to grant upon the most competitive terms possible the right to use any public utility that arises from the improvement of a navigable stream. It ought to get the best terms possible. It ought to make the bidders, or contractees, who assume to exercise any of these powers, prove that they have subjected themselves in the matter of charges and service to the continuing control of the State in which they were created.

This corporation does not offer to do anything of that kind. It does not even appear that it has not already plastered itself all over with stocks and bonds, based upon nothing but the prospect of getting a right or franchise from the Federal Government. The bonds might be sold in the market the very moment this bill is passed. This corporation does not say it is not going out to peddle its stocks and bonds in the market the minute it engages in this project of supplying water power from a Government dam; and for that reason, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the bill might well go back to committee for recasting.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, are further amendments in order at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. Not until this amendment is disposed of.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I would like to strike out the last word of the amendment for the purpose of getting the floor.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CULLOP. Would it not be better to commence with the first section of this bill, inasmuch as there are several Members who want to offer amendments to that, and take the bill up section by section, so that amendments to it may be offered section by section? For one, I want to offer an amendment to the first section. I think if we were to take it up section by section, commencing with the first section, and have the Clerk read it for amendment, we would get the bill in better shape at the end of the last section than we could by this promiscuous and haphazard method of amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That could only be done by unanimous consent. The bill now under consideration is a substitute for the original bill, and is of itself an amendment, to which only one amendment can be considered at a time. As soon as that amendment is disposed of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] can offer his amendment to any portion of the bill he desires, either to the first section or otherwise.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask unanimous consent that we take the bill up for amendment, beginning with the first section.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] asks unanimous consent that the Clerk proceed to read the bill section by section, and that opportunity be given so that amendments may be offered as the sections are reached.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I must object to that, for the present at least.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I wish, Mr. Chairman, to inquire when debate is closed on the last amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that debate has already closed, but the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Colorado, and he may proceed at this time.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that opposition to this bill is springing up from vastly different sources. I want to say it is a revelation to me, and a disquieting revelation, to see the eagerness with which our brethren from that section of the country, which always, from time immemorial, has been the champion of State rights, are tumbling over each other in their keenness to establish the principle that the Federal Government may reach into the States and tax the natural resources of those States.

The other day, when this question was first discussed, I suggested that there was a tremendously important principle involved here, and I was assured that the precedent had been so well established that it was not worthy of consideration. Thereupon I took the trouble to call up the War Department, and what I have to say now is particularly pertinent, in view of the last amendment that has been offered, namely, to give the Secretary of War the power to fix the prices and make the regulations under which this company is to operate, and to regulate the charges it is to make to the consumers for the use of the power generated. I asked the officials of the War Department whether there were in operation specific contracts involving this principle, and they were able to cite only one instance, and that was in the case of a river down in the State of Arkansas. I think it referred to the Batesville Power Co., or a concern of some such name. However, that is immaterial. It seems that some former Congress passed an act authorizing the Secretary of War to fix the rental or rate to be charged per horsepower to the company which was to utilize the power created by a dam constructed in that river.

I was informed that the Secretary of War first proposed to charge $10 per horsepower per annum, and the company said, "We can not do business at that rate." Then the Secretary of War said, "Well, we will charge you $5 per annum per horsepower." Eventually the reply came back from the company, "We can not do business at that rate." Then the Secretary of War said, "Well, we will charge you $1 per annum per horsepower."

Of course, it must be evident from this statement that the War Department was merely guessing at what it ought to charge, that it had no substantial, scientific, business basis upon which to make that charge. My informant told me over the telephone that he was not able to say offhand whether the department had entered into a contract with the company on that basis, or whether they had any existing contract with it, but he thought they had some outstanding contracts of this character, and that if I would send them a request in writing they would furnish me with that information.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I stated the other day, I am not concerned about the time for which this contract is to be entered into. I am not concerned about the rate to be charged, whether it is 10 cents per horsepower or $10. I am not concerned about the utter lack in this bill of any provision whatever to protect the consumers who are to use this power from that plant, although these are matters that ought properly to be considered if this principle is to be established. But I am greatly concerned with the principle of the Federal Government using the resources of a State as a basis of taxation, to the necessary and inevitable exclusion of that right upon the part of the State. I think I can demonstrate to you, gentlemen, that it will work an exclusion of the right of the State to tax its natural resources.

Mr. RAKER. The Government having built this dam, and by virtue of the building of it developed the power, so that all it is necessary to do is to attach the machinery and let the water generate the power, does the gentleman contend that the Government must let the property which it has created go to waste and that it can not dispose of it? Is that the gentleman's position?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Just a moment. I am not making any argument to the effect that it ought to go to waste, but I want to answer that question in my own way.

A while ago the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] had the floor, and I asked him how he distinguished, in the matter of Federal power and in the matter of the principle involved, between a charge for the use of this water power, which is incidental to the construction of a Government dam, and a charge for the use of the river for navigation purposes by private steamship companies. I asked him how he could differentiate between those two propositions, and he said, "I can not and do not." A moment later he said, "I am not willing to give away this created power without charge." Then I asked him if he was willing to give away without any charge the use of this river, which was being rendered navigable at the expense of the Federal Government, and the Judge refused to meet the issue and answer the question. He said that was getting off into abstractions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I should like five minutes more. I have not used any time on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I suggested the other day, Mr. Chairman, that the Government was spending tens of millions of dollars annually to improve the rivers and harbors of this country, and I instanced the case of the Ohio River, where many millions of dollars, eventually more than $60,000,000, are being expended to construct a series of dams down through the channel of that stream for the purposes of navigation, to be turned over free to private steamship companies, private transporters for hire by water, for their use and benefit. Of course there is an incidental benefit to the public, just the same as there is in the operation of a railroad; but it will inure, I contend, from a monetary and business standpoint, solely to the benefit of the private companies and individuals operating steamboats on the river.

After that discussion the other day I had a little revelation. I said to myself, "We people from the West are up against this proposition, and there is no escape from it; the Federal Government is going to tax our use of water for power purposes." They do not own the water, and they admit they do not own it. They admit that the ownership of the nonnavigable streams in the West is in the States, but, says the Government, we own the public lands bordering the streams and we will withdraw these lands from private ownership and charge you rental for the use of the land on which to construct your dam, a sum sufficient for and equivalent to a charge for the use of the water.

Some gentlemen the other day thought I was mistaking the difference in the case of a dam built by the Government, as in this bill pending before the House, and one built by a private corporation. I want to assure you that I made no such mistake; that the Government expenditure on this dam as the basis of the charge being made for the use of this water power is only the ostensible basis. The real thing the Federal Government is driving at is the extension and establishment of this new principle of the assertion of control over water power of this country by the Federal Government as a source of Federal taxation and profit.

Look how inequitably the system works. In New York, we will say, there is a nonnavigable stream capable of furnishing valuable water power. The land along that stream is owned by private persons. You could go up there and buy that land along the stream and erect a power plant and be absolutely free from the control of the Federal Government. The State of New York could levy any sort of a lawful tax on that property; it could not only tax the physical value of the property, it could impose a tax in the shape of a percentage of its gross or net receipts; it could put a tax on that plant which will be equivalent to a division of the profits between the private company and the State, just as is done in the case of municipalities with street car, lighting, and water companies.

Now, how would that operate in the State of Colorado? How would that operate down in the State of Alabama in the case of this river? You are going to assume in the first place that the Federal Government is going to make a substantial charge for the use of the water power, the Federal Government is going to charge for the use of the power all that the traffic will reasonably bear, leaving a profit to the owner. Can the State of Alabama ever tax that property? Could a company which had to meet this Government charge, based on what the traffic would bear, pay also an equally substantial State tax and compete with a privately owned plant? The answer is obvious. It would be utterly out of the question, so that the operation of the Federal tax must logically and inevitably exclude the power of a State to tax its own resources.

It occurred to my mind that if you propose to insist on fixing this principle on us, if you propose that henceforth no man shall build a water-power plant in the State of Colorado or in the Rocky Mountain States without paying to the Federal Government a tax equivalent to all the business will bear; and since there is no difference in principle between one part of the country and the other, the East or the West——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would like two minutes more, and then I will quit.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be granted 10 minutes more.

Mr. SPARKMAN. O, Mr. Chairman, we might as well have the bill killed one way as another, if we are going to take up all the time this afternoon in discussion.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Five minutes will be sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I will not object at this time if the gentleman does not ask for any further extension.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will not ask for any further extension.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the fact that this is not the time and these are not the conditions under which we can discuss and consider the tremendously important and revolutionary principles involved in this legislation. What I was about to observe is that if we of the West are simply butting our heads against a stone wall in our opposition to this new policy of the Federal Government going into our States and taxing our natural resources for the benefit of the Federal Treasury and to the exclusion of the powers of the State, we will accept the inevitable, but we will work out and advocate the extension of the principle all over the United States. So I think, Mr. Chairman, when I get time, now that I have seen the light, now that I have seen the error of my ways, I think I will work out the proposition of taxing the use of all the navigable waters of the United States upon which the Federal Government is expending money in their improvement.

I would impose a substantial tax which will be equal to a division of the profits, and that is what is contemplated in this case, and that is the life principle of this new policy—to effect a division of the profits between the Federal Government and a private enterprise—and we will work out that proposition and tax every carrier of passengers and freight for hire that floats on any navigable waters of the United States, whether in the rivers, on the lakes, in the bays and harbors, or in the coastwise trade, and we will make these waters upon which the Federal Government has spent millions of dollars a year since the creation of this Government, and upon which we now expend forty or fifty million dollars annually, a source of profit, as they ought to be, to the Federal Government. In other words, we will simply apply the principle of conservation. Why, Mr. Chairman, this principle, once you establish it, is simply inexhaustible in its possibilities. We will tax every railroad and tram-car company that builds a bridge across or runs over one of these navigable streams, not merely for the half mile or three-quarter mile of track or bridge that they use, but we will place a tax upon them that will be equivalent to a reasonable profit to the Federal Government upon the entire plant from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I can well appreciate, Mr. Chairman, that this statement on my part will excite a smile, that it would be considered at first blush as an absurdity, but, Mr. Chairman, who can foretell the day when some new Moses of conservation, with his soul aflame with the fire of the new nationalism, shall take up this proposition I have suggested, strike it into life, and start a propaganda for it among the people of the United States which will result in its successful establishment, its operation and application, just as has been done in the revolutionary principle of taxation and control over the water powers of the States that is being established in this legislation?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARTLETT. Did not the author of the new nationalism in this country suggest to Congress about as wild an idea as the gentleman has suggested with reference to the power of taxing this particular water power of the State?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I think he did, and I had a pamphlet around here a while ago with his veto of the James River Dam bill. He took occasion to say there that of course this was a new principle, but that its novelty was no argument against its justice or its merits; that it was no argument against the right or the practicability of the thing; and therefore, Mr. Chairman, it does not argue against my proposition simply because the Federal Government, through a system of political procedure and logrolling, grossly abused and distorted, that has grown up in this country and has become a tradition, pours out forty or fifty million dollars a year to improve the rivers and harbors of this country and then turns over their free use to a lot of private steamships and railroads. The long existence of this condition is no argument that it will be wrong now to right about face and make these things, as they ought to be, a source of profit to the Federal Government. So I think I will work that proposition out, instead of any longer opposing your schemes of western conservation. [Applause.]

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer the following substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment already pending to the amendment of the committee, in the nature of a substitute, and the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas is not in order.

Mr. MADISON. But should the Chair raise that point of order? Nobody has raised it from the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The rules provide that there can be but one amendment to an amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas said he wished to offer a substitute. Certainly a substitute can be offered at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule provides in terms as emphatic as we can read here at the desk that there can be but one amendment to a substitute, and we are dealing now with an amendment in the nature of a substitute to the original bill. The Chair thinks that the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas is out of order until the other is voted upon.

Mr. MANN. We are dealing with an amendment to the original bill, not a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. We have before us a committee amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment which I hoped would prevail, but inasmuch as the Chair holds that my substitute is out of order, I wish to say that I hope the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee will be defeated in order that I may have an opportunity to offer my amendment.

Mr. Chairman, let us see what may be and what often is the practical operation of the rule which the gentleman proposes to put in operation by his amendment. The gentleman provides that the Secretary of War shall fix the rate which shall be charged for the heat, light, and power. The rate to whom? The rate to the purchaser from the Birmingham Light, Water & Power Co. Suppose the Birmingham Light, Water & Power Co. does as many other companies have done under similar circumstances, sees that another corporation is organized to which is sold all the product of the Birmingham Light, Water & Power Co. Then what becomes of the ultimate consumer? Now, he is the man we are trying to look after, but, as a matter of fact, under the practical operation of the gentleman's amendment it is possible readily to deprive the ultimate consumer of the benefit of any rates that may be fixed by the Secretary of War.

We are about to meet the question of leasing coal lands in Alaska, and bills have been introduced providing that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall fix the price of coal. What coal? The coal at the mines. What about the ultimate consumer? Why the middle man takes care of him [laughter] as the middle man takes care of the ultimate consumer all over the United States to-day. And I undertake to say that, while the gentleman from Florida does not intend it, yet as a matter of fact there is a joker in the amendment as offered by the gentleman, and, if it carries, we will wake up some day and find——

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MADISON. Oh, I have only five minutes—will wake up some day and find that we have simply played the same old game of juggling the matter, and Mr. Ultimate Consumer has been lost in the shuffle. Now, my amendment provides, and we have a perfect right to make this condition to the contract, that they shall sell direct to the consumer. That is the gist of the amendment that I desire to offer and which I hope I will have an opportunity to offer soon, together with a provision that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall fix the rates, instead of the Secretary of War, and if you write those things into this bill, then the ultimate consumer will be protected. I think every man on this floor on this side of the House felt an echoing response in his heart to what the gentleman from Illinois, the minority leader, said awhile ago, in effect that we were laying down rules and principles here to-day in the making of this bill that went vastly beyond the importance of the bill itself. And that is what we are fighting for here to-day, to lay down safe, sound, conservative, practical principles in the conservation of our natural resources, and one of the things we must look after in Alaskan affairs, in coal-land leasing generally, and in the matter of dealing with our natural resources, as in bills like the one now before us, is that benefits proposed for the people do not get lost in going from the original producer to the ultimate consumer.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADISON. No; I only have a minute or two; I wish I could. And so I hope that the amendment which the gentleman from Florida offers will be voted down, in order that we may not wake up some morning and find ourselves surprised by the fact that while we earnestly tried to protect the ultimate consumer, the man who uses the power, that we had been, as a matter of fact, futile in our efforts and had accomplished nothing because of the fact that by the old familiar method of using another corporation he had been juggled out of the benefits that should accrue to him. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida suggests a very serious conflict if it were adopted by this House. Section 4 of this bill provides that the Secretary of War shall make certain arrangements with the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co., which company is organized for the purpose of carrying out the stipulations of this bill. Now, nowhere in the bill is there the slightest reference to any power conferred upon this company to manufacture or sell light or heat. Every section of the bill referring to that feature of the company's franchise refers to its manufacture and sale of power.

Now, the adoption of the amendment would enlarge the scope of the charter of the company if the charter of the company has already been granted in the language contained in that bill; that is, to carry out stipulations and provisions of this act of Congress. Now, my suggestion is this, that there is no place that this gives either an express or implied power to this company, so far as its charter granted by the State of Alabama is concerned. Now, if we read into it the enlarged power by conferring upon the Secretary of War the authority to fix the rate to consumers for light and heat, will that not necessarily either enlarge the scope of the company's powers or give rise to a very serious conflict, and will it not also give rise to this question as suggested by the gentleman from Kansas, if the Birmingham Heat, Light & Power Co. should sell its power to a third party, and the party using that power for the generation of light and heat, to still other parties, would it confer upon the Secretary of War the right to regulate the prices charged by another concern not referred to directly or remotely in this bill? I suggest these questions for the reason that I believe the gentleman from Florida does not wish to give rise to any such conflict.

Mr. COOPER and Mr. SPARKMAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN].

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection whatever to having inserted in the amendment which I have proposed the words "successors or assigns" after the word "company." I say I would have no objection to that whatever. If there is no objection to it, I will ask unanimous consent that those words be inserted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask my friend from Florida if he is familiar with section 5 of chapter 1 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which says:

> The word "company" or "association," when used in reference to a corporation shall be deemed to embrace the words "successors and assigns" of such company or association in like manner as if these last-named words, or words of similar import, were expressed.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am much obliged to the gentleman. I was not familiar with that section.

Mr. MANN. If you had to insert it in one place, you would have to insert it in forty.

Mr. SPARKMAN. In view of the statute which the gentleman has just read, I will not make the request. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment——

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will let me have three or four minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. All right.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have about five minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment be closed in 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. That is, on the amendment of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN].

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Chairman, I should, at least, like to have the right to extend my remarks in the RECORD, if I can get unanimous consent to do it, since the gentleman wants to limit the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from West Virginia prefer that request now?

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] yield for that purpose?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. LITTLEPAGE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill being that the Congress of the United States shall give to the Birmingham Water & Light Co. a franchise, running for 50 years, to harness the water power of the Black Warrior River, in Alabama, by the investment upon the part of the Government of a million five hundred thousand dollars in the construction of Government improvement in that river, in order to encourage and facilitate the development of the coal and iron industry along that river, and at the same time generate power for the convenience and accommodation of the business men having investments in the locality proposed to be affected, as well as to generate power and light for Birmingham and surrounding community, and the further consideration of $15,000 per year, or $1 per horsepower, revenues to the Government. While I stand for internal developments of the country in every direction, and believe that this Government belongs to the people, and one of the fundamental principles of the Government being to conserve the interest of the masses of the people by investments in the different localities in this Union of Government funds in order to encourage development in such localities, I at the same time recognize that a franchise for 50 years is of that vast importance to the Government itself and to all the people, especially to the people of the locality in which the investment and improvement is to be made and the franchise given, that we can not be too cautious in safeguarding, in the interest of the rank and file of the people, such an extraordinary franchise as this bill seeks at the hands of this Congress.

That the internal waterways of this Republic are of such vast importance that they must be developed and improved by the Government when the occasion arises and a proper situation is presented I do not deny. But, for the information of this Congress and in order to facilitate its action on this measure, I have in mind a case, which I ask the indulgence of the Congress long enough to relate, inasmuch as it may have, in your estimation, an important bearing upon the question of safeguarding, in the interests of the people, this proposed franchise. The rivers belong to the people as well as the Government—and when I say the Government I allude to navigable streams especially and those susceptible of being made navigable by the expenditure of the Government's money in proper cases and through proper channels.

The case I desire you to consider is that of the pollution and destruction of the New and Great Kanawha Rivers, the latter being a navigable stream for about 100 miles from Point Pleasant, on the Ohio River, to Kanawha Falls. These streams pass through my district for perhaps 240 miles, and they contributed before their pollution to the enjoyment and happiness of, I should say, 150,000 people in my State, the majority of whom live in my district, and the pollution has now gotten in that desperate situation that it affects directly and indirectly, perhaps, a million and a half of people from the Virginia line to Cairo, Ill., and even below there.

This Congress recently authorized, and the progressive and patriotic element of the citizenship of the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., made provisions for a visit by our Rivers and Harbors Committee from Pittsburgh along the Ohio River to Cairo, Ill., with a view of inspecting and reporting upon the advisability of—and in my judgment there is great necessity for—Government improvement of the Ohio River to the extent of having a continuous 9-foot stage of water in that great internal highway from Pittsburgh, Pa., to Cairo, Ill., that the coal, coke, iron, steel, farm products, and merchandise may be transported by steamer at any and all seasons of the year. This, of course, means a tremendous expenditure of public funds, but, in my judgment, nothing short of the construction, completion, and fortification of the Panama Canal is more important to the United States in the way of internal improvement than the contemplated improvements of the Ohio River. The Ohio River is more or less a sand-bearing stream, running as it does through great valleys of fertile soil. From Point Pleasant, W. Va., to Pittsburgh, the water in the Ohio River is clear for 6 or 8 months in the year; from Point Pleasant to Cairo, Ill., it is now muddy 10 months in the year, forcing the people using this water for drinking and domestic purposes to use muddy, slimy, and unhealthful water, as it has proved in thousands of typhoid cases, and when the people find out, as I expect to let them know before I conclude in citing the case mentioned, the exact cause of it, I believe there will be such a revulsion of sentiment that the Congressmen and Senators from Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, and Mississippi, on to the Gulf of Mexico, will be obliged to sit up and take notice. Go with me now, if you please, that I may relate to you candidly and faithfully the truth about a situation which has fastened itself particularly upon my people as a nightmare of oppression, humiliation, and shame.

The New and Great Kanawha Rivers are mountain streams. Their sparkling waters were as clear as crystal on an average of 10 months in the year before the grievance now so long complained of; but since a permit was given by the Secretary of War, in accordance with a resolution similar to this bill passed by Congress many years ago, enabling the Virginia Iron Ore Washeries to turn their refuse, mud, and muck into the New River beyond Radford, Va., these two great streams have been as muddy as mud holes for at least 10 months in the year during the past 16 years, and the situation has grown so bad that it is now intolerable; and although a contest has been waged by the people of my State to obviate and suppress this awful nuisance, we have been powerless to secure our rights, as the result of our inability to have this permit, issued by the Secretary of War, revoked.

I am at a loss for words to properly describe this situation of humiliation and shame thrust upon as good people as live, for all of whom my heart is full of sympathy, and whose tolerance has been such as to commend them to the favorable consideration of this Government and this Congress. Let me describe to you, if I can, the cause of this pollution, as I have been an humble member of a committee appointed by the legislature of my State to investigate and report upon the condition and cause of this pollution, and make such recommendation as to action to be taken as the situation warrants, looking, of course, to prohibiting this pollution, and I feel I know whereof I speak.

There are valuable iron-ore deposits in top of the mountain beyond Radford, Va. The deposit seems to be near the top of the mountains. This ore is mined by different companies, and there are tramroads constructed from the mines, over which the ore and dirt attached thereto is hauled in small cars to tipples, also on top of the mountain. There it is dumped over steel aprons and distributed into a steel trough running from the top of the mountain, quartering down the side thereof a distance of perhaps twelve to fifteen hundred feet; in some instances the distances are less and in others greater. Now, down at the New River they have for each plant, and they are numerous, 10 to 12 inch intake pipes, which are run out into the stream. There the water is as clear as a crystal, beautiful to look at, magnificent to behold, and full of game fish. By means of powerful pumps this clear water is drawn into the intake pipes and forced to the top of the mountain, where a bend is made in the pipe, so as to discharge clear, sparkling water into the steel trough, which is 3 to 5 feet wide, and at a point higher than the point at which the ore and dirt is dumped from the cars into the trough. The water is discharged with terrific force, which starts the dirt and iron ore to rolling down through this trough to a point near a second tipple, near the river, where the muddy water filtrates through a sieve and runs off into the river below. This is constantly going on. There another stream of clear water from another pipe strikes the iron ore, and by the time it is dropped into the railroad cars under the tipple, to be carried to the furnace, there is not the slightest mud or dirt on the ore. Where the water runs through the sieve and on into the river it is so full of mud that it seems you can nearly cut it in slices with a knife—not quite so bad, but nearly so.

There is so much mud carried by this and other streams of water from other mines in the vicinity that it is filling up the holes in the river for 50 or 60 miles below, and at one point, some 8 miles below, a ferry, which had been established for perhaps a hundred years, across New River, which at that point must be from 150 to 200 yards wide—I did not measure the distance—we were informed by the ferryman that the water in the New River up to 16 years ago, and until the iron-ore washeries commenced, at this point was very deep and clear, the deepest place being about 46 feet, and that the mud from these washeries had filled up this hole to the extent of destroying the ferry; and we were informed that a suit was brought against the company for damage to the owner of this ferry, and a third party, a stranger, bought out the ferryman, his rights, and so forth, thus stopping the litigation. Now, the Government has the authority to revoke this permit, given, as stated, by the Secretary of War, because of a provision reserved therein to the effect that in case the dumping of this refuse into the river should impede or endanger navigation, then the Government should have the right of revoking the permit.

Now, the Government has constructed in the Great Kanawha River, from Point Pleasant, so as to throw slack water up to the vicinity of Kanawha Falls, about 11 locks and dams, at a cost of from $200,000 to $300,000 each, and in some instances more. This muddy water and mud is now easily traceable from the exhaust pipe at the iron-ore mines, a distance of between 300 and 400 miles, to the mouth of the Great Kanawha River at Point Pleasant, and there it muddies the water in the Ohio River from the mouth of the Great Kanawha to Cairo, Ill., and on into the Mississippi River. Cincinnati people—the President's home city—have this filthy, slimy, muddy water to use constantly. Instead of having three great, beautiful streams—the Ohio, the Great Kanawha, and the New Rivers—they are almost dead for domestic use. Think of it, Congressmen! Clear, sparkling, beautiful water 11 months in the year, and so beautiful that they were fascinating to look upon, magnificent to bathe in, to camp near, and to fish in—all gone. Game fish have disappeared—camping parties no more. To look upon them is to shudder, and to drink the waters you must first let the mud settle.

Twenty years ago in passing along the Kanawha and New Rivers you could observe the happy women taking in clothes from the clotheslines apparently as white as paper. Now, as the result of this pollution, they either have to let the water stand for days in barrels, dip it out with caution to wash their clothes, or they are as yellow as saffron. God Almighty intended that the poor people of the country should be at least kindly treated. He intended that the strong and the powerful should not humiliate them and impose upon them. The fundamental principle that is actuating men to change their political convictions in this country is to get relief from oppression—oppression that is constantly biting at their financial vitals, and which turned the minds of men in 1910 and will completely turn them in 1912. The humble Christian citizenship owning property along the Kanawha and New Rivers on wash days assemble and leave their homes, go away with their washing to mountain streams, sometimes at great distances from their homes, in order to get clear water in which to wash clothing that the children may have clean clothing to go to Sunday school and church, there to grow up under Christian influence. Think of the imposition upon my people, so long neglected and so outrageously treated. Think of their patient suffering, their despair.

There is but one way of avoiding this imposition, and that is on account of its impeding and retarding the navigation on the Great Kanawha River. The deep holes in the river are being filled up. When we have a freshet in that stream the banks are left lined with a slimy, filthy, red mud, the odor arising from which is beyond your conception, because you have not come in contact with it. This mud has been traced to the lock chambers, and is so settled around the gates and in the lock chambers that the Government of the United States is required to sustain the additional and unnecessary cost and expense of flooding these lock chambers, scraping and dredging out this mud, traced by experts from the Virginia mines all the way along the two rivers to the mouth of the Kanawha, and affects every one of the 11 locks. It also affects and shortens the life of the heavy chains used as a part of the mechanism of the locks or wickets from 8 to 10 years. Not only is that true, but it shortens the lives of the steamboat boilers from 8 to 10 years, necessitating ofttimes the laying up of the steamboats in order to clean the mud out of the boilers. This mud creates in the boilers blisters and causes them to rust out. It affects every pipe in the machinery room through which this muddy water passes, necessitating ofttimes a complete renovation, to the great loss of time and expense of steamboat men and to the great injury to their business. This is not all, so far as the Government feature is concerned. Those operating steamboats and water craft under a license issued by the Government—and these licenses are very high, too—from the watchman on the steamboat to the mate, from the engineer to the fireman, from the pilot to the captain, everyone charged with a public trust, must be licensed by the Government. This revenue to the Government is of vital importance to the Government, though oppressive to the men who have adopted the steamboat business as a life's vocation. Every one of these men have either to drink this muddy water or stop the boat long enough to fill up barrels from some convenient well or inviting mountain stream.

Twenty years ago you could stand on the bow of the steam vessels plying the waters of the Great Kanawha River and look down into the water a distance of 10 to 12 feet, there to behold the pike, the salmon, the catfish, the bass, and the trout and other kindred fishes passing under the boat. Now you can not see 6 inches beneath the surface of the water—fish apparently all gone. Of course, it is clearer at this season of the year than any other time, but you western Congressmen, in passing over the line of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad, which is one of the greatest and best roads running into Washington, look out from the car windows as you pass through the New River canyons along the banks of the Kanawha, wending your way to your western homes, where you are surrounded with plenty and practically everything you wish, look. I pray you, upon the polluted waters of the Kanawha and New Rivers—if not now, watch them later—and think of the imposition upon my people. Think of their hopes, ambitions; think of the past and of the present. Study, if you will, and I pray you to stop long enough by the wayside in your official life to study the history of these two great and historic streams, once beautiful, clear, and grand—naturally so because of the topography, soil, pebbles, and rock over which their waters tumble in their course to the sea—and lend hope to my people, whose humble servant I am, to the extent that you help me, when the time comes, to do that which I would only be too glad to help you to do.

I have called your attention to this sad case, not with a view of obstructing the ambitions of the Congressmen here advocating the bill under discussion, not with a view of obstructing in the slightest degree the great improvement contemplated on the Black Warrior River, in the great State of Alabama, which State has given to us one of her noblest sons, whose honor and official integrity we each and all testify to; who is the leader of one of the greatest committees the Congress of the United States has ever had; who is leading the American people from political thraldom to the promised land, as were led the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt through the deep sea, which after their passage closed in on Pharaoh and his host, destroying them. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the majority party in this House have in the Speaker of this House and in the floor leader of this House, namely CHAMP CLARK and OSCAR UNDERWOOD, two of as great men as this country can produce, and in whom the American people recognize a fine quality of presidential timber. And as to the minority side of this Congress, I have for them but words of the kindest praise. We are all here in this Congress, away from our people and loved ones at home, and should act as a band of brothers for the one specific purpose of upbuilding, as is becoming of American freemen, better hopes and better conditions, that the men and women of all creeds and of every political faith may look to Washington in the future, if they have not in the recent past, with greater hopes and fonder expectations; that the courage of men, and men themselves, whose ambitions have started on the decline, may look to a brighter future, as I believe a new era of advancement and prosperity will soon dawn upon the American people. I believe that the men and women of this country are, as a rule, growing better and nobler every day of their lives.

I have not taken up time in describing my case, which I felt was somewhat in point, with a view of embarrassing any man either in or out of political life, but with a view only of reminding the Congress of the necessity of properly safeguarding this bill, and to the extent further that this bill shall be safeguarded in the interest of the people living in that happy southern clime. I love the people of the Southland. I rejoice at their advancement and achievements, and I want to see them prosper. I admire their intellect, their courage and chivalry, as they are the most hospitable in the world, and the world does not produce people of nobler impulse. Kind, faultless in their courteous deportment, brave and bold as lions, faithful and patriotic.

To you great men of the North, South, East, and West, let me present the oral petition of my people, praying for your help in saving to them and this Government those two great rivers in my district, that my people may in the years to come, when you and I shall have passed over the River of Time to our reward, remember us as their benefactors, their friends in the time of trouble.

I shall, Mr. Speaker, at some more convenient time, crave the further indulgence of this Congress, that I may go more fully into the matter of the pollution and destruction of the New and Great Kanawha Rivers, and give to this branch of the Government of my country a more complete history and account of the great outrage and injustice my district has been suffering for so many long and dreary years. I want this Congress to continue, by its course, to demonstrate to an anxious people and long-suffering people that it can and will afford relief and is anxious to do so in proper cases. All of which will contribute to a better citizenship, a greater love of country, and a better understanding among men.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate be closed in 10 minutes; I to have 3 minutes, if I need that much time, in conclusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida moves that all debate on the pending amendment be closed in 10 minutes, 3 minutes to be reserved by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN], who declared that the pending bill is an effort to establish a precedent utterly destructive of State rights. The gentleman announced with vigor that he was opposed to the Government of the United States grabbing control of the resources of a State. The fallacy in his argument is plain. This dam is to be built in a navigable stream, at large expense, by the Government of the United States. The money of all of the people of all of the States is to construct it; not the money of the people of Alabama alone. Slack-water navigation is to be created, and there is also to be created water power of very great value.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. COOPER. Not just now. I prefer to conclude, then I will yield.

This water power is to be brought into existence by the expenditure of money taken from the Treasury of the United States and belonging to all of the people of the United States—money of the people of Tennessee, of New York, of Pennsylvania, of Wisconsin, and of every other State—and yet, according to the gentleman from Colorado, this water power, worth millions of dollars and created by the expenditure of the money of all of the people of the United States, suddenly becomes the property of the people of Alabama, a part of the resources of that State.

The gentleman from Colorado does not wish the people who furnish the money, who build the dam, who create the slack-water navigation and the millions of dollars' worth of water power, to have anything to say about that water power because, as he insists, it will be the property—a part of the resources—of the State. What logic is this? Where does he find warrant for it in the Constitution? Where does he find warrant for it in the ordinary dictates of the plainest justice and common sense?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. COOPER. Not now. This water power will be the property of all of the people of the United States, because their money will create it.

The gentleman complains that there will be no opportunity for taxation by the State if the Federal Government has anything to say as to the rates for the use of that water power. Will there not? Thousands of electrical horsepower will be generated and leased to a private corporation. That private corporation will lease it to other private corporations and to municipalities and private individuals. These private corporations and individuals will erect manufactories and other private establishments upon the soil of Alabama. Instantly the taxable property in Alabama is largely increased in amount and value, and at once the taxing power of the State comes into play and levies taxes upon it. Who is wronged? Nobody is wronged. Nor is it proposed to wrong anybody, excepting only the taxpayers of the United States, who, it seems, are expected to create this exceedingly valuable water power and give it to the people of Alabama without a cent of remuneration.

That proposition is opposed by the so-called new nationalism. New nationalism has been misinterpreted and sometimes deliberately misrepresented. It has no such meaning as has been attributed to it upon this floor. Concerning this question it means that water power, created as this water power is to be created, is the property of all of the people and that control of it should be retained by the people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I wanted, Mr. Chairman, to ask the gentleman a question before his time expired.

Mr. MANN. How much time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes remaining, and in that request was included a request for three minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the gentleman from Florida offered the amendment which he did with reference to fixing the rate, thereby cutting off the opportunity from friends of the rate-fixing power of offering an amendment in the first instance. I have only a few minutes, and if I can get the attention of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN], who has had half an hour, I will be greatly obliged.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. MANN. The matter comes up on an amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN], the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, who reported the bill and the substitute. I gave notice in the House the other day that I would offer an amendment preserving the power to fix the rates. I have an amendment prepared. The gentleman from Kansas has one, and other gentlemen have amendments.

Now, under the peculiar parliamentary situation, the gentleman from Florida, claiming the right to the floor, offers an amendment, which we either have to vote up or vote down, because we can not amend it.

I expect to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN], and then I intend to move to recommit the bill, so that it will be properly taken care of, after a proper expression of opinion in the House. If the men in this House who are in favor of conservation do not have the opportunity of offering their amendments to perfect the bill, we want to see the bill in print as it is prepared by the gentlemen who originally reported it and who then were not in favor of conservation. I fear the Greeks bearing gifts.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to no one in devotion to the principle of rate regulation. I believe in lodging somewhere the power to regulate rates that are to be charged by public-service corporations, or by anyone serving the public, as it is proposed that this corporation shall serve the public in the sale and distribution of power. I am as much a friend of that principle as is my friend from Illinois, or anyone else on this floor. I wish to thank the gentleman from Illinois, however, for saying that he is going to vote for this amendment, and I hope in the end he will vote for the bill.

It was suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], and has been charged by others, that we are giving away a great deal to this corporation; that the Government of the United States is expending a large sum of money for the development of power which is to be turned almost without charge to a private company. This is a mistake, for in building a dam 63 feet high at the site of Dam 17 no more power will be developed than the Government will need for the purposes of transportation for use in operating the locks there, so that if any power beyond that is developed afterwards there it must be developed by this or some other company and by the construction of a dam at or near Sanders Shoals.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate having been closed on the amendment of the gentleman from Florida, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "provided," in line 9, page 11, insert the following: "That the Secretary of War shall have the power to fix and regulate from time to time the rates which the said company may charge to consumers for light, heat, and power, and provided."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question being taken and on a division (demanded by Mr. SPARKMAN) there were—ayes 77, noes 36.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida, chairman of the committee, offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 17, page 11, after the words "rate of," insert the words "not less than."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the original project for the development of the navigation of the Black Warrior River contemplated the construction of several dams and five locks. There has been no survey and no project adopted covering that part of the river which will be affected by the construction of this higher dam.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman is mistaken in that. There has been a survey and a recommendation for Lock 20, and for Locks A and B in Mulberry and Locust swamps.

Mr. MADDEN. But no project covering the part of the river which will be affected by the raising of the water by reason of the construction of a higher dam at 17.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman said there had been no survey. There has been a survey, and a favorable report.

Mr. MADDEN. Not on this proposition.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Not on this proposition. This carries it 30 miles above the point where the surveys have been made and the project adopted.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The project has only been adopted as far as 19, but there has been a survey for 20 and for A and B in Mulberry and Locust swamps, and a favorable report on that. The 63-foot dam carries the water just as far as that other project would carry it.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, the construction of this dam contemplates the expenditure of over $2,000,000. The increase in the height of the dam, while incidentally reducing the necessity for building several other dams, would never have been thought of but for the fact that water power was in process of development above this dam.

The company to which this water power is to be leased, if it is leased at all, has a contract with the State of Alabama under which it is required to build a dam about 50 miles above where this dam is to be constructed, across the shoals, at a cost of about a million and a half dollars, to be paid by the company, for the purpose of creating a reservoir in which may be stored the water required to create the water power in that section of the river over which the State of Alabama has control.

The water coming down from this dam which is to be constructed by the water-power company would come down over this section of the Black Warrior River anyway, whether the company wanted it to come down or not. As a matter of fact, water power would be created because of the fact that this water comes down from the dam at the shoals. The project has been changed and the Government of the United States would, under the provisions of this bill, be required to expend over $2,000,000 in the construction of a dam to create 15,000 horsepower electrical energy, to be leased at a nominal price to this water-power company.

Now, this company in order to secure the right from the State of Alabama was required to expend a million and a half dollars. Why should the Government of the United States expend $2,000,000 to give to this company 15,000 horsepower for nothing, while the company is required to pay out of its own treasury a million and a half dollars to secure similar rights from the State of Alabama?

To say that the construction of the dam would not create any electrical horsepower energy is to state something that is not the fact, because the construction of this dam at 63 feet high could not fail to create water power. Why could it not fail to create water power? Because the volume of water is coming down from above over the dam erected at the shoals by this company, and it could not send the water down to the dam without creating water power. Now, if that be the case, why not compel this company to build a dam at Lock 17 as well as to build a dam above? Why should the Government of the United States expend $2,000,000 as an investment for a private water-power company to enable that company to sell the product of the labor of the Government of the United States, the product of its expenditure, at a high and profitable price to private consumers? [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is very much mistaken in his facts. The Government of the United States does not propose to expend $2,000,000 for the sole purpose of creating a water power for the benefit of any private corporation.

Mr. MADDEN. They expend it for building a dam.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The Government of the United States proposes to expend $257,000 less than the project for which the gentleman himself voted as a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and for which he voted as a Member of this House, and which has already been adopted.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. As a matter of fact, does not the Government of the United States expend $2,028,000 in the construction of this dam?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Whether that be incidentally or primarily invested or expended for the development of water power cuts no figure if the private company gets the benefit of the expenditure out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I beg the gentleman's pardon, it cuts a great deal of figure. Whereas we spend $2,028,000, if this bill is defeated we shall have to expend $2,285,000 for these other three dams in the river, and there can be no water power developed, and the United States Government will have to pay $150,000 additional for flowage rights. If this bill goes through this company agrees to pay the flowage rights and $50,000 toward the construction of this particular dam. It puts in a dam at Sanders Shoals, which the engineers think possibly the Government may hereafter be required to build at a cost of a million and a half dollars. They save us $20,000 annually in the operation of the locks, and then they agree to pay the Government of the United States, after they have installed their plant, built the poles, stretched the wires, and begun to operate, 5 per cent of their gross income. And yet the gentleman seems to think that we are giving them $2,000,000. I am constrained to think that the gentleman from Illinois has not read any of the reports, and certainly has not heard any of the debate.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. On what basis does the gentleman assume to state what this company will have to pay for flowage rights?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Upon the estimate of the engineer.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Who is at present the owner of these flowage rights?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Various parties. They are in private ownership. They lie in the lowlands along there.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Has the company any power to enforce the purchase of those flowage rights?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. None at all. They are to agree, under a contract with the Government, to purchase those flowage rights and then transfer them free of cost to the Government. Of course, if the Government builds the dam the Government has the right to condemn the property and take it.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the bill, on page 12, does not compel that company to acquire such rights.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; but to transfer them; and they must be acquired before they can be transferred.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Would not the supposition be that that would be a transference of whatever rights they have?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The bill is certainly very inadequate on that subject.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In my opinion the bill covers that amply; but I understand there is an amendment to be offered to make it clearer. In my opinion, it does not need any further wording. I believe it covers it now, that they are to transfer to the Government the flowage rights.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Suppose the private owners refuse in any circumstances to convey those rights?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Then there will be no contract made.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will that defeat the whole legislation?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; that will defeat this particular contract. The dam will be built and the foundations so laid that the Government can hereafter make a favorable contract with a company that can acquire those rights.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Of course the Government has the power to proceed under the right of eminent domain.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Would the gentleman have any objection to leaving the bill down to section 4 and letting the Government proceed to make those improvements and then dispose of the water power later on?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I would have to object to it, because I think we have obtained a most favorable contract, an infinitely more favorable one than any other contract that has ever been proposed since I have been a Member of Congress. We have every year passed bills of this character, giving water-power companies the right to develop power under different conditions, but never under conditions half so favorable to the Government as provided for in this bill.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I differ with the gentleman on that——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Just wait a minute—and never before has any bill, although the rights of the Government have not been safeguarded, although the Government has not saved one-half the money that is to be saved in this bill—never before has a bill that was brought in here met with such opposition as has this bill, and it is a curious fact that the bill that is presented here with the most favorable contract for the Government is the one that has been most strenuously assailed.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Does the gentleman contend that in previous bills the Government has given water power to private corporations under circumstances where the private corporations were not to construct the improvement themselves?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I did not say that at all.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. That is a very different proposition.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Why, they are to construct improvements in this instance to the value of $1,700,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, as this bill, or substitute, was reported from the committee no discretion whatever was lodged with the Secretary of War with reference to the provisions that should be incorporated into this contract for the first 20 years. The duty of the Secretary of War, so far as the making of a contract was concerned, was entirely ministerial. Through the amendment adopted a few moments ago discretion is lodged in the Secretary of War to determine and fix the rate to be charged the consumer. The amendment pending proposes that the rental to be paid shall be not less than $1 per horsepower per year. Perhaps it was the intention of the author of the amendment to lodge discretion with the Secretary of War to determine what that rate should be, but I submit that with the bill as it will read thus amended no discretion is lodged with the Secretary of War to determine that rate.

It will read the rate shall be not less than $1 per annum for horsepower developed, which rate shall be subject to readjustment by the Secretary of War at the end of the 20-year period. But who will determine the rate in the first instance? Is there any language in the bill imposing the duty upon the Secretary of War to do so? Clearly not. That, Mr. Chairman, I believe is a plain and fair construction of the bill; but even if I be not correct in that, if there be discretion lodged in the Secretary of War to fix the rate, where and upon what will the Secretary of War base his discretion to increase it? Will it be upon any facts coming before him? He will have the judgment of this Congress that it should not be less than $1 per horsepower; but upon what facts will he increase it? Upon the basis that it is worth more to the Government? Why, all the Secretary of War needs to do is to examine the debate upon this bill, and he will at once see, as any man would see, that this Congress did consider in passing this bill what it was worth to the Government, and when it said it shall not be less than $1 per horsepower, while there may be a discretion granted to the Secretary of War, he would not change the judgment of this Congress. But, Mr. Chairman, if this minimum rate were stricken out entirely and an absolute discretion lodged with the Secretary of War to fix a rate, then it would be notice to him, when he came to determine this question, that this Congress determined not to pass upon that question one way or the other, but it was left to him to determine what rate should be proper. And, Mr. Chairman, I submit that this amendment should be further enlarged if it is to accomplish the purpose that is presumably sought, or else defeated entirely.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman evidently has not read the bill with care, because section 4 of the bill provides that a contract shall be entered into between the Government and this company, and in that contract provision shall be made for the payment by the company to the Government of an annual rental for the use of the water power developed at Dams 16 and 17 for a period of 20 years, and that the rental shall be at the rate of not less than $1 per annum per horsepower developed. Then it goes on to provide that at the end of that period the Secretary of War may rearrange the rate from time to time after each 10-year period.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman contend that the expression "shall be subject to readjustment by the Secretary of War" authorizes the Secretary of War himself to fix the rate?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I should say so; yes, most assuredly.

Mr. MANN. I should say it would simply give authority to the Secretary of War to agree with the company on what the rate should be.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If it means anything at all it means what it says, and it says that the Secretary of War himself shall readjust the rates.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. It does not say the Secretary of War shall readjust it, but it says that the fixed rate for 20 years shall be subject to readjustment by the Secretary of War, and if we had fixed the rate the Secretary of War would have no authority to agree upon a change of that rate except by our permission. It is easy enough to make that clear if that is the intention.

Mr. SPARKMAN. What amendment would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. MANN. I was going to offer an amendment to strike out the word "readjustment" and insert "to be fixed at his discretion," so it would read: "Which rate shall be changed and fixed at the discretion of the Secretary of War."

Mr. SPARKMAN. When we come to that I do not know that I will have any objection to it.

Mr. MANN. It can be easily changed, if that is the intention, and I think it is.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer one more amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 2, page 15, after the word "reserved" strike out the period and insert a comma and add: "And the United States shall incur no liability for the alteration, amendment, or repeal thereof to the owner, owners, or any other persons interested in any dam or other structures which shall have been constructed in accordance with the provisions at or in connection with Dams Nos. 16 and 17."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is self-explanatory, and it was inserted out of abundance of caution. It was thought at one time when this bill was introduced here that it covered that feature anyway, but, lest it did not do so, we concluded to insert this amendment, and have done so. I do not desire to discuss it further, and I call for a vote upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN and Mr. RAKER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to follow section 6 of the substitute:

"Before this act shall take effect as to the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co., the Secretary of War shall in a public manner advertise for and receive bids from persons or corporations who may desire to be substituted for the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co. as the beneficiary of this act. And if any person or company shall in making a bid offer better terms for the Government than are herein provided for to be received from the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co., then the Secretary of War shall accept the best bid offered. And thereupon such best bidder shall in all respects as to this act be substituted in place of the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co. If such best bid be not made by that company, in which case the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co. shall not have or receive any right, title, or interest under the provisions of this act."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not be adopted. Its effect would be practically to strike out everything after section 3. It would only leave the part which authorizes the 63-foot dam.

Now, I have no objection ordinarily to the submission of a question like that to competition in the way suggested. In fact, ordinarily, it seems to me it would be a good proposition, but each tub must stand on its own bottom, and in this particular case it so happens that this proposed power company controls all the rights, in the way of lands and water privileges in and around Sanders Shoals, where this great power is really to be developed, so as to make it impossible for anyone else to compete with them.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. SPARKMAN. In just a minute I will; yes. As I say, they control, or at least I am informed that they control, all the rights there that give value to the water power. They control the flowage rights, much of them even below the proposed site of the dam at Sanders Shoals. So if that amendment goes in, nobody else can compete with these people. The amendment would hence be useless so far as the public is concerned, and in my judgment would destroy the bill or at least all of the sections after section 3.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, if what you state is the correct version of it, we have been unable to get at even who this company is. It seems to be a myth floating around in space, but if it be true now as you state it, then this amendment could do no harm whatever, could it? If so, how could it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It would have the effect, Mr. Chairman, as I said a moment ago, of destroying all the sections after section 3. It would not, perchance, prohibit the Government going on and putting up a dam 63 feet high at the site of 17. However, upon reflection, I am inclined to believe some change in or additions to the first three sections would be necessary in order to have the engineers go ahead with the 63-foot dam.

Mr. CULLOP. We could amend the others so that they would be in harmony with that provision. The companies would have a right to go into court and protect their rights. If not this company, still any third party who would buy this right at a higher price would have the right under the law for condemnation, and their rights fully protected, and it could not come in and drive any other company out. So that the amendment answers a very valuable purpose in the bill, it seems to me.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am not able, I will say to the gentleman, either to admit or to deny the proposition that these companies or individuals, if you please, would have the right of eminent domain. I do not know just what the law is in Alabama, but I am inclined to believe they would not have that right.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, another proposition——

Mr. SPARKMAN. But I say, Mr. Chairman, this amendment, in my judgment, would destroy the bill, the whole of it after section 3, and if we do that we might as well amend the bill at once by striking out everything after that section. I want to say to the gentleman that I have no interest whatever in this corporation, and personally I do not care anything about it.

But I do feel an interest, after the navigation features are cared for, in the conservation of power. I think it a sound business policy to conserve for future use the surplus water that is now going to waste, and that will continue to go to waste there if the 63-foot dam is not constructed. This I believe in doing in the interest of the people, both of the State and of the country.

Mr. CULLOP. I know the gentleman has no interest in this bill, and nobody seems to have any interest in it; but what has the gentleman to say as to the objection to the amendment? If the objection is well founded, then the Government has not the right to build this dam, because these gentlemen can stop it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, as far as I was able to hear the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and gather therefrom the meaning, he proceeded upon the idea or claimed to believe that there are a great number of individuals and corporations who are eager and anxious to take possession of such water powers that are in process and expectation and hope of being developed in certain States of the Union. Alabama, I admit, has great expectations from her water powers. My observation relative to the matter now under consideration is that if a thoughtful man who really desires accurate and reliable information will run his memory back a few years over the record of water powers, he may find many instances where water powers have been wrecked and proved disastrous failures. Does a sensible man think that a man with money to invest will not inquire the cause of such failures? Why, I ask, why did so many of them fail? They failed because of the drastic restrictions placed around them—restrictions which were not in harmony with what I believe to be the real, true conservation spirit of this country relative to these great public utilities.

The Government proposes to encourage the development of these great water powers, not to prevent development solely for the purpose of making money, but chiefly to increase the general prosperity, to develop the wealth, and make these natural resources great and valuable assets for the whole people. It is not simply to make money. This debate has surprised me greatly. I never dreamed of the diversified views expressed on this floor on this subject. I have taken the position I hold deliberately and not under any excitement—and which position is vigorously assailed by able gentlemen—the position that the Government, wherever it spends money for the improvement of navigation, has the right of control solely and alone over the navigation—the running water. In that it is supreme. It has no right or control whatever over anything but that; but in the exercise of that right it has the power to prevent any individual or corporation from obstructing that navigation, and the Government in that respect and from that standpoint grants merely to an applicant a permission to obstruct a navigable stream. Wherever the Government spends money, I contend, and incidentally develops water power, I believe it has the right to rent it out, or, I should say, collect dues under its excise rights.

I stand here to-day, Mr. Chairman, as thorough and as earnest a State rights man as any on this floor, and I deny that when that is done the Federal Government invades directly or indirectly any right that the State of Alabama has. [Applause.] The State and Federal Government in this important right each exercises its constitutional power and in nowise conflict. What right or power does the passing of this bill take from Alabama? The question comes back to the proposition of my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that this proposed permission or franchise shall be let out to the highest bidder. Oh, that is a very catching proposition. The cry is, Give everybody an equal and fair chance, and yet no one has heard of but one sole applicant, and he is feeling his way with care. We are not offering for sale, at an ordinary town sale, a horse, a cart, or a lot of household second-hand furniture. It is not in that spirit that we approach this great, broad subject of conservation and improvement and development of the water powers of our country. We are all, or should be, eager to forward the splendid spirit abroad in our land looking to the proper development of these great electrical energies.

It is not appropriating money for the benefit of Alabama out of the Treasury of the United States, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] said, when this water power is granted. But the fact is that in this instance, without paying out one dollar, the Government receives $1 per horsepower up to the end of 20 years; and the increase of its excise dues will continue by periods as long as the water continues to run. That amount of money is contributed to the Government until finally, in the true spirit of conservation and in its full meaning, the Government gets back every dollar that is appropriated for that purpose, even where it pays for the lock and dam.

That is my idea of it, and for that reason I differ, Mr. Chairman, with the gentleman from Illinois in the amendment that he offers, providing that we shall put up the franchise to the highest bidder. Bring them all in, get them there, advertise it down there in the papers of Alabama for six months, and you will not have a single bidder unless it be the present applicant. Why, we are undertaking to carry out the true spirit of conservation, and I beseech that we should not forget that is the development of water power. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, either this amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois should be adopted, or else an amendment should be offered and adopted by this committee striking out all beginning with section 4 of this bill. In other words, we should leave the question of the development of the navigation facilities of these streams entirely on its own merits and pass the first three sections of the bill, and then, if incidentally it is found that a valuable water power is developed in the natural and proper improvement of the navigation of these rivers, let us, upon proper deliberation, with the facts before us as to its value and how it can be used, devise a policy consistent with the general policy of sane conservation and dispose of that water power under proper checks for the protection of the consumers. But here we are asked, in the closing days of a special session called for special purposes, as a part of the modification of a plan for the improvement of navigation, to enter upon an entirely new policy, different from any that has been seriously urged, and to legislate into this bill the disposition ultimately for 50 years of this water power without any showing as to what ought to be done with that power and without any information before this Committee of the Whole that will enable us to pass intelligently upon that question.

Personally I should prefer to see these first three sections adopted and let us proceed promptly with this improvement along these new lines proposed by the engineers; and then let us take time at the regular session of Congress to conform the disposition of this power to the demands of the public mind, which is now very much awake upon this general subject of the conservation of our natural resources, including water power.

There are certainly numerous objections to this manner of disposing of this power. I do not know anything about this company, but I am told by one who has seen the prospectus of it that that prospectus shows that the company has a capital at the present time of $20,000; that it is proposed to issue something like $3,000,000 of bonds to be disposed of, and $3,000,000 of stock, and that 25 per cent of this stock is to be given away in the interest of promotion.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I have very little time, but I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. So far as the issue of bonds is concerned, in my judgment that is all right; but as far as any such issue of stock is concerned, that can not be done under the laws of Alabama.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. A Member who has seen the prospectus and has it in his possession tells me that this is proposed in the prospectus. I simply state it upon that authority.

Now, inevitably, gentlemen, any proposition that, under the cover of a general public improvement that we all favor, to wit, the navigation of this stream, carries with it the conveyance of valuable power privileges to a private corporation, specifically named in the bill, is bound to give the Government and the people the worst of it. It is impossible to consider impartially the merits of the question of the disposition of this power simply as an addendum to a great enterprise for the public improvement of that river. There need be no haste in this matter.

The gentlemen from that part of the country say there are no other companies that can compete with it. If so, the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will not do any harm. They may be wrong on these facts. We have no information before us, from the committee or from any other source, as a result of special investigations of the subject. Certainly, in the light of the public mind upon this subject, in the light of the importance of fixing at this time a permanent and safe policy in the interest of development, as well as in the interest of the consumer, let us not hastily, under the momentum of the improvement of the navigation of that stream, tie up the rights and title of the Government in this water power that may be developed beyond the possibility of amendment in the interest of justice and in the interest of the public at large. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the substitute offered by the committee for the bill, and on the amendments thereto, be closed in 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I should like two or three minutes.

Mr. RAKER. I have an amendment that I should like to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. This motion does not cut off the right to offer amendments.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I did not intend by my motion to cut off amendments, but only to limit them to that period of time.

The CHAIRMAN. It would close all debate in 10 minutes, and within 10 minutes amendments could be offered.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I make the motion, Mr. Chairman, that all debate be closed on the committee amendment and all amendments thereto in 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. So that no further amendments can be debated? Then I shall move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will change that motion and move that all debate on the pending amendment of the gentleman from Illinois be closed in 5 minutes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can make it 2 minutes so far as I am concerned.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Then I will make it 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Florida is to close debate on the pending amendment of the gentleman from Illinois in 2 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that anyone can seriously oppose the amendment I have offered. The bill grants rights to the Birmingham Co., and the amendment I offered is that before it takes effect as to the Birmingham Co. the Secretary of War shall advertise for bids. Anybody can bid; the Birmingham Co. or anybody else can bid. The Birmingham Co. has the best of it, being now named in the bill and having certain rights there. But if some other company, a municipal corporation or an individual, offers better terms than the Birmingham Co. offers, then that other company or individual would be substituted for the Birmingham Co.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. They have cut me down to two minutes, and now the gentleman wants to interrupt me.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I only wanted to say that I am willing to agree to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. MANN. Now, some gentlemen have figured out that the promoters of this company, if this bill passes, stand good to make fees of $10,000,000. If that be the case, and I do not know whether it is so or not, it is perfectly fair to put it up and see whether anybody else will bid more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate on this amendment has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, to strike out in line 22, page 9, the words "and for the development of water power," and insert a period after the word "respectively."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 9, line 22, strike out the words "and for the development of water power," and insert a period after the word "respectively."

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that amendment is this. If we pass this bill, we authorize by legislation a contract to be made which binds the Government to keep this dam in repair and make its contract good. Now, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has said that they do not care anything about the development of water power; they want this bill passed to improve the navigation of the Black Warrior River. So that it will do no injury to strike out that part of the first section, which will keep the bill just as the gentleman from Alabama wants it kept, and not a law to create a water power for some company or some individual; but it will be a bill to improve the navigation of the Black Warrior River; and that is the reason why I have offered this amendment, so that the Government will not be bound in the future to keep its contract by keeping the water power improved.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I have just one word to say about that. These words were put in at the end of the section to enable the Government of the United States, in building the locks and dams, to prepare for water power hereafter, in case this company failed to comply with the contract. If the Congress makes the contract in such shape that the company will not accept it, the Government is authorized simply to prepare the dam for water power hereafter and make such arrangement as may be in the interest of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out sections 4, 5, and 6.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which is proposed is to strike out all that part of the bill that affects the development and the use of water power. With that amendment adopted, I should gladly vote for the bill, because with that amendment adopted and the bill confined to the purposes of navigation, this House would be moving along the well-defined lines that it has moved over again and again. But sections 4, 5, and 6 of the bill precipitate here a question with which this body has not dealt. Personally I believe that the powers of the Federal Government are confined, so far as the development of streams is concerned, to navigation purposes. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], with the usual close analysis that he gives to legal matters, has analyzed this bill, and he has pointed out and asserted that wherever the Federal Government constructed a dam for navigation and thereby created incidental powers, it ought to follow those incidental powers; but had it occurred to the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. Chairman, and to other gentlemen here in this House, that, based upon our experience, that sort of a contract will lead not to the logical development of the theory of the gentleman from Wisconsin, but to the development of water power, not for navigation but for power.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman used the words "incidental power." The argument I made was this: That where the Government of the United States, using the money of all the people, created a power which can be made into money, or which is wealth, that that wealth, that profit, belongs to all the people, and the Congress of the United States has the sole right to dispose of it.

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; I remember. The gentleman restates his words accurately, but let me say now to the gentleman from Wisconsin and to the other gentlemen in this House, that if this bill passes, passing over the argument of new nationalism, passing over the question of whether the Federal power or the State power ought to be exerted—if this bill passes with those last sections in it the time will come, and come quickly, when the argument will be made on the floor of this House that we should build a dam over some river, and when it is suggested that navigation will not be promoted thereby, it will be replied, "Perhaps not, but power will be developed that will bring into the Federal Government a return of 6 per cent."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] will not be agreed to. I understand it is to strike out all but the first three sections of the bill. It seems to me that we have discussed this matter sufficiently that we might have the opportunity to express our opinion on amendments which will be offered covering the policy of the Government in this case. That is probably the only thing that will result from the consideration of this bill, unless having stricken out a part relating to the company and having sent the bill to conference, as the hands of the clock come around to the time when the final hour of adjournment is fixed, with most Members away at home and a few here who are interested, this bill becomes a law ahead of something else. I have seen it frequently occur in this House where matters which had been rejected by the House were brought back in the form of a conference report, sometimes when it could easily have been defeated by raising the point of no quorum, but when one dared not raise the point of no quorum because there was not a quorum in the city, and that would have ended everything else that was pending. We have spent three days on this bill. Let us vote on the amendments that are offered to the bill. Let us see what the policy of the House is in reference to these matters, instead of sending the bill to conference, with prospects of being skinned in conference.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT) there were—ayes 49, noes 83.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. After the word "locks," in line 13, page 11, strike out the period and substitute a colon and insert the following: "And provided further, That said company shall only sell light, heat, and power developed from said water power direct to the consumer."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send his amendment to the Clerk's desk. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "locks," in line 13, page 11, strike out the period and substitute a colon and insert the following: "And provided further, That said company shall only sell light, heat, and power developed from said water power direct to the consumer."

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment covers the matter about which I addressed the House a few minutes ago, and I am not going to take up very much time now. I fully appreciate the fact that the gentleman from Illinois a moment ago accurately described the situation. It is perhaps true—and, I think, absolutely true—that the main purpose that can be served now is to have the House declare itself upon certain principles of conservation. Now, there is presented by this amendment this question: Shall we actually protect this bill from a joker? not designedly so, but true just the same, whether by design or not. Shall we protect this bill against the opportunity, if the bill becomes a law, on the part of this company named in the bill to extort unreasonable rates from the consumer? It in all human probability will get this contract; the information which we have before us shows that it is very likely there will be but one bidder for this contract. In fact, under an amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, unless some other company offers a better proposition, this contract goes to the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co.

Now, then, it has practically got the contract to-day, and that being true, let us protect, if we can, the ultimate consumer; let us for once write in the law of this land a protection to the consumer against the middle man. That is what this amendment means; that is what it aims at. It provides in direct and specific terms that this company can only sell its water, heat, and power developed from this water power to the consumer. The amendment of the gentleman from Florida provided that the rate to be paid by the consumer should be fixed by the Secretary of War, but there is no provision whatever in the bill as it stands now that provides that the company shall sell to the consumer. It may go to work and do as I said awhile ago is often done—provide for some company that acts between the main company and the consumer and sell practically all of its product to that middle company, and thus absolutely defeat the purpose included in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADISON. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I want to see if I understand exactly what the gentleman's amendment is aimed at. In some parts of the country where these power companies are installed and electric power is produced there are other companies called transmission companies. The power company sells to the transmission company and the transmission company carries it all over the country and sells to the consumers. Is it the purpose of the gentleman's amendment to strike out the transmission company?

Mr. MADISON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Or to regulate the charges which they make?

Mr. MADISON. I would eliminate such companies. That is a familiar device used to defeat the object of provisions of the kind aimed at by the gentleman from Florida when he offered his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman this question. Suppose they desire to sell power or heat or light to the city of Birmingham, and the city of Birmingham fixed a municipal rate to its own people, they could not do it under this bill nor could any municipality in the State of Alabama buy from this company and sell to its own citizens. The gentleman does not mean to do that, does he, yet that is the effect of this amendment.

Mr. MADISON. No.

Mr. HILL. Absolutely. The city is not the ultimate consumer. They sell it again to their own people at cost or at any other price.

Mr. MADISON. The city of Birmingham, as a matter of fact, in this instance is provided with light.

Mr. HILL. There are plenty of places that desire the privilege.

Mr. MADISON. Just a moment. I want to answer the gentleman's question. I understand the purpose of asking it and I understand the force of it, but the real fact of the matter is in this case that this is a small project, and that it is one in which the Government is participating, and the city of Birmingham is not a possible purchaser at all. Instead of that, there are numerous manufacturing projects, large and small, throughout that vicinity that are probable purchasers, and the gentleman's question, while it seems to have force, as a matter of fact, as applied to this particular case, does not.

Mr. HILL. I think the gentleman is mistaken. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON].

Mr. COOPER. Could not the gentleman make an exception as follows:

Excepting in case of municipalities?

Mr. MADISON. I will accept that amendment, and it may be written into my amendment as offered—

Except in the case of municipalities.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. There is no reason to put in that requirement as to the State of Alabama, because the municipalities and the counties in Alabama, under the constitution, are forbidden from engaging in internal improvements.

Mr. MADISON. It will not hurt anything to have it in there.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. You would not except a corporation that has a contract to light the city and sell to individuals?

Mr. MADISON. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be adopted. I am not in favor of restricting a party selling anything that it has to sell any more than we have restricted it in this bill heretofore.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that he was in doubt.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 96, noes 64.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN and Mr. CULLOP rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 14, after line 24, by inserting as a new section the following:

"The determination by the Secretary of War of the amount of rental due the Government from the company at any time shall be conclusive and binding on the company; and if the company at any time fails to pay to the Government the amount of rental due, within a time to be fixed by the Secretary of War, or fails to comply with any of the provisions of this act on its part to be complied with, or fails to comply with any of the provisions of the contract on its part to be complied with, or fails to comply with any regulations or directions which the Secretary of War may lawfully make or give, or fails to observe the charges for the sale, lease, or other disposition of its powers which may be prescribed from time to time by the Secretary of War, then the rights hereby granted shall become null and void as to the company and shall become thereby vested in the United States. At the end of the period of 50 years herein above provided for all rights, interest, and property of the company acquired under or by virtue of this act shall pass at once absolutely to the Government, unless Congress otherwise provides."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that he was in doubt.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 110, noes 20.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after section 3 and insert the following:

"SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to report to Congress the amount of electrical power made available by this act; that he shall further report the cost of equipment and the cost of property rights needed for the production of electrical power in connection with the work provided in this act; and that said report shall be made on or before December 11, 1911."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that with the general disposition to amend this bill at the present time, and with the inconsistent amendments offered, both on behalf of the Government as well as on behalf of the rights of those who are trying to get this electrical power, we will not get a bill which would treat the Government fairly or treat the individuals fairly. But the adoption of this amendment would leave the bill in a shape where the Government may proceed and build the Dam No. 17. In the meantime, up to the 11th of December, 1911, the Government engineers may report the full condition as to the cost of the work and the cost of the overflowed land and the value of the flowage, and so forth, and at that time the Committee on Rivers and Harbors will have all the facts and data before them necessary to enable them to bring in a bill to give the corporation concerned, or anyone else, if it sees fit, the right to buy at public auction this privilege, properly protected from the standpoint of the Government as well as from the standpoint of the individual, and then the matter can be fully and thoroughly thrashed out after this Congress has been supplied with the information it ought to have before it passes upon it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the contract has been let for Dam No. 17. As I said to-day, a railroad has been built to it, and if this bill passes at this session of Congress the contract will go on. Of course if this does not pass it will not affect the immediate situation for the contractor. He will still go ahead with his work, but he will build, not the Dam 17 as contemplated in this bill, but the Dam 17 that is already provided for and in process of construction.

Mr. JACKSON. Oh, no. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. JACKSON. I understood that the amendment offered by the gentleman from California provided, as the bill provides in the first three sections, for a change of plans, and only strikes out that section which relates to power, and directs the Secretary of War to make a report as to that power.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the proposal to add to the cost of this improvement will not commit anybody else to pay for it?

Mr. RAKER. I understood from the statement that was made that the building of Dam No. 17 would cost the Government $240,000 less than to build Dams 17, 18, and 19. Now, in my amendment I strike out all after section 3, leaving the Government free to build Dam No. 17 and the lock 63 feet high; and then, if they want hereafter to dispose of the electrical power, they will then have full information when Congress meets in December to enable them to act intelligently upon all the facts.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In making this expenditure and making the contract, no provision has been made for anybody to pay for it. You change the contract plan, and if what the gentleman says is so, you commit the Government to pay the additional price and to pay for the overflowed land and for the extra dam. Nobody stands in the place of the Government.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It commits the Government to payment for the extra flowage, but the gentleman contends that the Government would save more than $100,000.

Mr. MANN. That is not the report of the engineers.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. This dam will cost about $250,000 less than the first project, and the flowage rights will be paid for by this company if the contract is made. If the contract is not made with the company, the Government will have to pay that $250,000, leaving us a little more than $100,000 to pay.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand the additional cost for overflowed land amounts to half a million dollars. I think you will just commit the Government to pay half a million dollars more, besides this dam, if you adopt this amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we have spent three days in the consideration of this bill. The proposition is that now we are not intelligent enough to perfect it, but that we may be at some time in the future, when we have not considered it at all; because it is quite safe to say that the House will never again have the opportunity of considering this bill for three days.

The Chief of Engineers has reported, as I understand it, recommending that this change in the lock and dam be not made unless the water power is to be utilized. If the proposition of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] prevails it will be left to the discretion of the Secretary of War to make the change, and his engineers have reported that the change ought not to be made unless the water power is to be utilized, and there is no provision for the utilization of it, as I understand it, in the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Where does the gentleman find any such recommendation in the report of the Secretary of War?

Mr. MANN. I read it to the House the other day, in the report of the Board of Engineers, that the change ought not to be made unless the Government was assured $5,000 a year revenue to cover the extra cost. That is in the report of the committee and in the report of the Board of Engineers. Let us at least see whether we can go far enough to whip this bill into shape, and then if necessary recommit it to the committee in order that they may put on the finishing touches.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is it not a fact, and has it not been repeatedly stated here on the floor of this House during this discussion, that if this bill was defeated the contracts already made for previously authorized dams would go on in every respect without interruption or interference?

Mr. MANN. But I am in favor of perfecting the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is what will happen if this bill is defeated.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I desire to say that I made a mistake just a moment ago in answering the gentleman from Alabama. The Government would save $257,000. The flowage rights of $150,000 that I spoke of were included in the total cost of $2,000,000, and, even if the Government paid the $150,000, the saving would be $257,000. So I was mistaken when I said if these sections were stricken out the saving would be only $100,000. I hope very much that the sections will not be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment:

On page 11, in line 2, strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "twenty-five."

So that it will read:

For a period of 25 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, line 2, strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "twenty-five."

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I submit that a franchise of this kind for 50 years is too long; that it ought not to be the policy of the Government to give franchises for that period; and that 25 years is long enough.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

The question being taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. CULLOP) there were—ayes 86, noes 80.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, is it too late to ask for tellers?

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment, which has not yet been reported by the Clerk. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 11, line 19, by striking out the word "readjustment" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "be changed or fixed in his discretion."

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 10, line 20, by inserting, after the word "company," in brackets, the following: "hereinafter styled 'the company.'"

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 11, line 13, by inserting after the word "locks" the words "and dam."

Mr. MANN. That provides for the lighting of the grounds both at the locks and the dam.

The question was taken; and the Chairman being in doubt, on a division there were 101 ayes and 4 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 11, line 11, by inserting before the word "operation" the words "lighting and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 12, line 6, by inserting before the word "regulation" the words "approval and."

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 12, lines 9 and 10, by striking out the words "of the construction of Dam 17" and inserting "or any connection with the construction or improvement of Lock and Dam 17."

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 14, by inserting after line 10, as a new section, the following:
"That nothing shall be done in the use of the water from said dam or otherwise to interfere with or in any way impede or retard the operations of said locks or the proper and complete navigation of the river at all times, nor in any way to interfere with the use and control of the same by the United States Government or the maintenance of the water surface above the dam at the established minimum pool level; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to prescribe regulations to govern the use of said water power and the operations of the plants and force employed in connection therewith, so far as the same applies to the operation of the locks.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.
Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, page 13, line 23, after the word "War," the following: "The structures provided for being always subject to the provisions and requirements of this act and to such stipulations as may be imposed by Congress or by the Secretary of War for the protection of navigation and property and other interests of the United States."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.
Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.
The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, on page 11, line 20, the word "ten" and substitute the word "one."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island.
The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.
Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, before asking for a division——
The CHAIRMAN. Unless the gentleman demands a division, the Chair will announce that the noes have it.
Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to state that I do not believe those who voted "no" understood what the amendment was.
Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.
The CHAIRMAN. The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.
Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.
The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, line 20, strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "five."

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, since the franchise has been amended the period of readjustment ought also to be amended.
The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.
The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CULLOP) there were—ayes 40, noes 97.
So the amendment was rejected.
The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the adoption of the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute as amended.
The question was taken, and the amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.
Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill as amended to the House, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended be passed.
The motion was agreed to; accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FERRIS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 943) to improve navigation on Black Warrior River, in the State of Alabama, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with a recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.
The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?
Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the amendment changing the franchise from the period of 50 years to 25 years.
Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is only one amendment pending to the bill. There was an amendment in the nature of a substitute. That substitute has been amended, and the bill has been reported back with a recommendation that the amendment be agreed to.
The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. The question is on adopting the amendment in the nature of a substitute as amended.
The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.
The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.
The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.
The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the Senate bill.
The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama) there were—ayes 124, noes 41.
So the bill was passed.
On motion of Mr. SPARKMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. CATLIN, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Charles A. Coulson, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.
Also, the papers in the case of John J. Barlow, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.
Also, the papers in the case of John Quinn, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.
Mr. HARDWICK, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of a bill for the relief of William J. Whitfield, no adverse report having been made thereon.

PUBLICITY IN PUBLIC AFFAIRS.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am unalterably opposed to the principle of legislating by a secret caucus. I opposed it when my party was in power in this House, and I shall fight it just as bitterly now that your party has a majority. It is no answer to me for you to say that the Republican Party legislated in the same way when it was in power, for I did not participate in the secret caucuses which tried to dictate legislation, and often succeeded, during the last few years.
Of course, in time of war, it is necessary for an officer commanding an army to make secret plans and to hold his councils with his advisers in secret; but there is no analogy between two great political parties, each striving to legislate in the interest of a mighty Nation of 100,000,000 people, and two antagonistic armies, each trying to defeat and destroy the other.
Mr. Speaker, I believe in the principles of the Republican Party, but I have no commission to come here and devote my time to playing politics and trying to gain political advantage by methods that will not bear the light of day. I take it to be my duty to represent the whole people of my district and the Nation and not to represent some political organization.
I am opposed to secret caucuses, because I am not afraid or ashamed to have the people of my district know how I feel and vote on all public questions. They send me here, they pay my salary, I am their agent, and they have a right to know what their agent is doing.
The gentleman from Wisconsin, my distinguished colleague [Mr. COOPER], says:

Legislation by secret caucus is defended by some good men, but it opens the way for mediocrity and cowardice, shrinking from duty, to go before the people and say, "It was not what I wanted at all, nor what I thought right, but the caucus told me to vote for it and I obeyed."

Mr. Speaker, I am surprised and disappointed at the position taken by your party on this great issue. You have had secret caucuses on every important matter that has come before this Congress. Take the wool bill for an example. You say that you did not tie up hand and foot the Members of your party, but the roll call shows that out of a total Democratic membership in this House of 228 only one man, Mr. FRANCIS, of Ohio, had the temerity to stand out, assert his independence and virile manhood, and in the face of Democratic jeers and ostracism refuse to be bound by the caucus.
And more than that, my Democratic friends, you were afraid of the pure sunlight of publicity. You refused to allow a single newspaper reporter to be present; nay more, you bound the Members to secrecy.
What a commentary is this on popular government. The Representatives of a great party, the hired servants of a sovereign people, were afraid and ashamed to let the American public know what transpired behind those closed and bolted doors.

You justify this secret action on the grounds that the result was good. Who knows at this time what the result was? What promises were made? What interests are to be taken care of? What "goods" are you bound to deliver before this Congress finally adjourns on March 4, 1913?

Scores of your Members believed in free wool, yet, with the one exception, you marched them onto the floor of this House, bound and gagged like galley slaves, and voted them for a 20 per cent duty on wool, and on August 14 you voted them for a 29 per cent duty. While Mr. Bryan, the greatest Democrat of you all, was thundering for an open conference and for free wool, you were meeting in secret and bartering and dickering and trading as though your votes were your own, and not those of the people who sent you here.

Mr. Speaker, it is only a few months since that little band of insurgent Republicans stood out in the face of party disfavor, endured the loss of presidential patronage and committee appointments, and refused to answer the crack of the party whip, in order that we might have publicity and freedom in the National Congress.

Our cause was righteous, and we were vindicated in our revolt against machine rule by the American people.

We appealed to you for help, and many of you Democrats came to our aid and assisted us in the fight that was made. The voters of this Nation took you at your word. They believed that you were sincere in your professions. They did not think that you were playing politics; and as a result you reaped much benefit for your actions in coming to our assistance.

I believe that you are in power to-day in this House solely because of your attitude in assisting us, the Republican insurgents, in that memorable fight.

Your actions in this Congress show that you were not sincere, and the American people, when they learn of your perfidy, when they find that you worship at the throne of King Caucus, will repudiate you as they repudiated the machine Republicans last November.

There are 391 Members of this House. Your caucus rules provide that on a matter of principle two-thirds of those present, provided that is a majority of your membership, shall bind all those present. You never have all of your members present, but, for the sake of argument, let us suppose that all attend. In this case 152 men can bind the whole 228, and they can pass any bill that they may desire to pass; 152 men control the whole 391 on matters of principle. As a matter of fact, a much smaller number controls.

This is not government by the people, or government by parties, but rather government by a ring in a caucus.

My good friend the Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS, of Nebraska, said to you the other day:

> Then these men take the measure that they have considered in this secret caucus, bring it before the country, and go through the silly formula of permitting men to offer amendments, and the Members who are pledged by that secret caucus vote down every proposition, regardless of whether it appeals to them favorably or otherwise. Thus has the caucus been able to control the action of officials of the Government. An unofficial organization in secret controlling the official action of official men!
> I want to say to you, gentlemen, that this is wrong in principle, and the American people will not stand for it indefinitely. When they realize and understand that their Representatives' hands are tied and their Representatives' votes are controlled by a secret caucus, by unofficial action of that caucus, they will rise in their might and condemn any party that stands for it.
> You have said that you want to get rid of the czar. You have renounced the czar and sworn allegiance to a king. You have jumped out of the frying pan into the fire. Hold up your manacled, wounded, bleeding, shackled hands and let the country see your parliamentary slavery! Why do you not renounce your allegiance to King Caucus and give your consciences an opportunity to act?

I want to tell you, my Democratic friends, that you will have some mighty puzzling questions to answer before next election. Suppose some constituent should ask you why you voted against an amendment to the free-list bill offered by Mr. LENROOT, of Wisconsin (p. 1036, CONG. REC.), putting the product of the Biscuit Trust on the free list. What will your reply be? Of course you will have to say, "My caucus tied me up and I could not."

Suppose some constituent asks you, this summer, why you voted to put the farmer's wheat on the free list and to put a duty of 50 cents a barrel on flour in the interest of the great milling concerns. What will your reply be? "I was gagged by my caucus."

Suppose some inquisitive farmer should say to you, "Why did you vote to put my cattle, sheep, and hogs on the free list and put a duty of 1½ cents a pound on dressed meats in the interest of the Beef Trust?" Will it be any answer to him to say, "I know it was all wrong, but I attended the Democratic caucus and had to surrender my convictions to the majority"?

What are you going to say to the old soldier. When he totters into your office and asks you about his private pension bill and about general legislation, are you going to satisfy him by hiding behind a Democratic caucus? You have had your secret caucus and decreed that everything under the dome of heaven shall be investigated. You have spent months working on tariff legislation, and have refused to devote one hour to the old soldier. In one hour you could put through a general pension bill that would take care of all the Union veterans. At the fall of the gavel at adjournment time each day 540,000 ex-Union soldiers are one day nearer the final "muster out." At sunset of every day 100 of them have passed beyond the river. You are powerless to join with us in granting to them, not charity, but justice; powerless, because you are bound by that secret caucus.

Gentlemen, over the door of the caucus room should be inscribed, "Who enters here leaves individual independence behind," and over the inner portal should be written the words, "Who departs hence leaves political hope behind."

Mr. Speaker, the time is fast approaching in this country when the voters are going to demand that Members of Congress retain their individual independence. The time is coming when no one will be permitted to merge his judgment and conscience into the common judgment and conscience of the mass. The American people are going to demand that men be men and not mere cogs in the wheels of a political machine. They are going to insist that their Representatives be loyal to them first and to the party afterwards.

When that time comes the weakling who desires to hide behind caucus action will disappear from public life, blind partisanship will disappear, trading and logrolling will be done away with, and the American Congress will become again what it once was—the greatest deliberative legislative body in the world.

And while I am discussing the subject of publicity in public affairs, I wish to call attention to the fact that practically all committees of the House act in secret on important bills. Some one moves that "We now go into executive session," and the door is closed and all spectators are excluded.

There may be some reason for taking this action occasionally by some committees—the Committee on Foreign Affairs or possibly on Naval Affairs and on Military Affairs—but the same reasons do not apply to the vast majority of the committees of this House. We are public men doing the public's business, and I believe that our actions should be taken in public. A public record should be made of all votes on public bills by each Member in order that the people may know whether we, their servants, are serving them well or ill.

A long step was taken in the conference committee on the wool bill the other day, when Senator LA FOLLETTE, the great advocate of publicity in Government affairs, moved for a public session. I believe that this marks the beginning of a great movement for more light.

As the sunlight kills the germs of disease and death, so also will the pure sunlight of publicity in public affairs kill the germs of corruption, political bargaining, and questionable practices in governmental affairs. The public is entitled to know everything about the public business.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to place in the RECORD the arguments made by Mr. Joseph E. Brown and Mr. Frank Powell against the doctrine of free raw materials when they debated this question with the representatives of the Baylor University of Texas. Messrs. Brown and Powell were representing the William Jewell College of Missouri and had the negative side of the proposition—that raw materials should be admitted to the United States free of duty. I may add, Mr. Speaker, that the verdict of the judges was unanimously for the negative—against free raw materials.

DEBATE—WILLIAM JEWELL COLLEGE V. BAYLOR UNIVERSITY, WACO, TEX., APRIL 13, 1911.

Resolved, That raw materials should be admitted to the United States free of duty.

Decision unanimous for William Jewell College.

[Joseph E. Brown, first negative.]

Mr. Chairman, honorable judges, friends, let me say to the gentlemen of the affirmative before going further that when we oppose the admission of raw materials free we are not advocating a protective duty on them. We do not wish to take your time to prove to you that for our National Government to raise an insurmountable wall of protection about the New England manufacturer of finished products and at the same time thrust the Texas producer of raw materials out into competition with the world is both unconstitutional and unjust in the extreme. But we rest our case on the fundamental Democratic doctrine of a tariff for revenue only, and are here to-night to prove to you that as long as revenue must be collected from imports the importer of raw materials should bear his just proportion of the burden of government.

Against the judgment of the gentlemen from Baylor that free raw products would prove a blessing to our country, we bring the judgment of the wisest statesmen this country has produced. Against their conjecture that free raw materials would promote any material welfare and further development of our Nation, we present the fact that the greatest national growth, the most wonderful national development known to all history, has taken place in America under a prevailing practice of taxed raw materials. And against their contention that correct economic principle demands the admission of raw products free, we argue that correct principle demands the taxation of raw products as long as finished products are taxed.

We favor taxing raw materials as long as other imports are taxed; first, because it has been our prevailing practice in the past, during which time our Nation has prospered far beyond the dreams of the most enthusiastic. The Republican protective policy, as I said, we shall not uphold, but shall confine ourselves to an examination of the Democratic tariff-for-revenue doctrine.

The national Democratic Party has never consistently favored the admission of raw products free. The doctrine was first promulgated by the Whig Party in 1842. The Democrats opposed it then under the leadership of one of the greatest Democrats that ever lived, John C. Calhoun, whose sound democracy has never been impeached, who said in a speech against the bill: "There is not a raw material which is not admitted duty free or subject to a very light one. The bill is framed to exempt one branch of industry from all burdens and shackles and subject the other exclusively to them." Every Democrat in Congress opposed the Whig tariff act admitting raw materials free. And, again, in 1846, when the question was brought to an issue, every Democrat in the United States Senate, except three who were avowed protectionists, voted against free raw products. In this list of sturdy Democrats we find such illustrious names as John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina; Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri; Lewis Cass, of Michigan; George McDuffie, of North Carolina; Samuel H. Houston, of Texas; and his colleague, the brilliant Senator Rusk.

From that time all through the years of Democratic supremacy the doctrine of free raw products never received any substantial support. Not until 1888 was the theory recognized by the Democratic Party. In that year the Morrison bill incorporated the doctrine, but only by a bare majority of the Democrats in Congress, and so strong was the opposition to it then that, notwithstanding Mr. Cleveland's loyal support, it could not secure the approval of the national convention in 1888.

In 1892 the Democratic national convention declared in favor of free raw material for the first time, but even then the leaders of the party in Congress saw the unreasonableness of the theory and supported it most feebly. Iron and coal were the only raw products from which it was even so much as proposed to relieve the duty. And a Democratic Finance Committee of the Senate reported a 40-cent duty on iron ore. It is true the motion was made to relieve the duty on iron ore, but not by a Democratic Senator, and not a single Democratic Senator supported that motion. I might say in passing that Richard Coke, then Senator from Texas, voted against free iron and went on record as opposed to the principle of free raw material.

In 1896, having realized its mistake in 1892, the Democratic national convention omitted entirely from its platform the declaration in favor of free raw products. Both the delegates and the States were practically a unit against the pernicious policy. Since that time the policy of admitting all raw materials free has never been sanctioned by the Democratic Party, either in convention or in Congress.

Not only has the national Democracy repeatedly denied the doctrine of free raw material, but the people of Texas have also raised their voice against the unjust policy. As I said, Samuel H. Houston and Gen. Thomas J. Rusk—perhaps the greatest names in all the long list of Texas' great—opposed free raw products in 1846. Gen. Richard Coke, another illustrious Texan, opposed free raw materials in 1894. And in 1896 the Democratic Party of Texas, assembled in convention at Austin, embodied the following declaration in their platform: "We believe that the present tariff law which lets into this country raw materials free, while it levies heavy duties on manufactured products, violates the Federal Constitution as well as the principles of the Democratic Party." That platform merely reaffirmed the position of the national party when it said in its platform of 1896, "We hold that tariff duties should be levied for purposes of revenue only, such duties to be so adjusted as to operate equally throughout the country and not discriminate between class or section." The national platform omitted the clause of 1892 favoring free raw material and substituted a demand for equality in tariff rates. The State platform only more forcefully condemned free raw products.

And again, in 1896, the people of Texas proclaimed themselves against the policy. Gov. CULBERSON, candidate for election to the United States Senate, said in his first address to the people of Texas: "The State platform of 1896 expresses my views against free raw materials." Hon. Roger Q. Mills, then Senator and candidate for reelection, announced himself as favoring free raw materials. It is true this question was not the only issue, but it was, no doubt, the paramount issue. And it is sufficient to say that Senator Mills, on his free raw material platform, was so utterly defeated that he withdrew from the race before it was hardly begun.

The senior Senator from Texas, Hon. JOSEPH W. BAILEY, has been returned to the Senate at every election since 1893, and he has been eternally opposed to free raw products.

But coming down to more recent times, when the question of free raw hides came up in Congress in 1909, both United States Senators from Texas and 15 out of 16 Texas Representatives voted against free raw hides. And, honorable judges, let me ask you, if a man votes against relieving the duty on one raw material, can he justly and logically say that he favors the admission of all raw materials free? The Texas Democracy in convention declared against the doctrine and the Texas Democracy in Congress declared against it when they failed to apply it to raw hides.

But we have more proof from history against this obnoxious theory. The people of the United States have consistently opposed free raw products, but have favored a tax on them as long as there was a tax on other incoming goods. The Whig Party carried the election of 1840 by an unprecedented majority. But that party propounded the most monstrous doctrine of protection and incorporated in the tariff bill of 1842 the doctrine of free raw materials. The bill was a stench in the nostrils of the American people from its very inception. And the American people in 1844 rewarded the Democratic Party, which had opposed free raw products both by the force of oratory and by its vote with an overwhelming majority in both Houses of Congress. The Whigs had turned a glorious victory into an inglorious defeat merely by advocating the doctrine of free raw materials.

In his famous message to Congress on December 2, 1845, President Polk laid down the clearest definition of the Democratic tariff policy that has ever been written. That message contained no suggestion of free raw material, not even a suggestion that duties on raw products should be low. The only articles, according to President Polk, which should be exempt were, in his own words, "such articles of necessity as are in general use." Is raw iron, a confused mass of iron, clay, and rock, in general use in Texas? Are raw hides worn by the people of this great State? Is raw wool, just as it comes from the shearer, an article of necessity? Yet, gentlemen of the affirmative, you advocate free raw iron and a tax on the nails you use to build your homes; you advocate free raw hides and a tax on the shoes upon your feet; you advocate free raw wool and a tax on the coats on your backs, and still claim to be ardent in the people's cause and true Democrats!

But to my former point. The Democratic tariff law, denouncing free raw products, followed Mr. Polk's message in 1846; and under that policy the Democratic Party enjoyed till 1860 the greatest success and the greatest favor with the people of this country that it has ever seen.

But history repeats itself. In 1892 the Democratic Party not only elected a President and won a majority in the Senate, but carried the House of Representatives by the largest majority that ever before represented the Democratic Party in that body. But, ignoring the sad experience of the past, that Congress, in 1894, passed the Wilson tariff bill, which sought to apply the fatal doctrine of free raw materials. Only one result could follow such a rash and unpopular act. In 1896 the Democrats suffered a most crushing defeat. The Democratic President was replaced by a Republican President; the Democratic Senate became a Republican Senate and the Democratic majority in the lower House of Congress not only disappeared, but was replaced by the largest Republican majority that ever sat in the House of Representatives, not even excepting the days of the Civil War. These, honorable judges, are the only times when the people of this country have been able to express their views, and both times they have been overwhelmingly opposed to free raw products.

But you ask why we have spent so much time in following the Democratic policy regarding raw material. We say that we believe with you, my friends, and with the people of this great State, in the Democratic doctrine of a tariff for revenue only. And we are calling your attention to the stand which men of like faith have taken on this question of free raw material. We do not propose a protective duty on raw products. We believe that our Government should levy such duties on imports as will provide revenue sufficient to run it; no more and, honorable judges, no less.

It has been urged that a tax on raw materials increases the price of the finished product, and hence is finally paid by the consumer of the manufactured article. If the manufacturer charged for his product according to the cost of production, this would be true. But the Democratic Party has always contended that this is not the case. The manufacturer of all duty on his raw material. But we propose a get for it regardless of its cost to him. And the tax on the finished product, not the tax on the raw material, determines the price he can get.

Some of the more honest, undaunted in the people's cause, contend that to lower the tax on the finished product we must first relieve the manufacturer of all duty on his raw material. But we propose a juster, more Democratic way of dealing with this question. Levy tariff duties for revenue only, and, as a famous Texas Senator said, "instead of relieving the manufacturer of all tax on his raw material and relieving the people of only a portion of the tax on the finished product, thus leaving the manufacturer's profit as high as ever and compelling the producer of raw material to lose all that the people gain, we insist that both the manufacturer of finished products and the producer of raw materials shall be compelled to share in the reduction which we seek to make in behalf of the whole people."

Mr. Chairman, honest but superficial thinkers have accused us of being protectionists because we advocate a revenue duty on raw materials. But in the next breath they are arguing for a revenue duty on finished goods, and excuse themselves from the charge they have made against us. They have said that we are traitors to the sacred principles of Democracy; but we remind them that a tariff for revenue only is surely a Democratic policy, and that is all we are contending for. They have condemned us for refusing to make a step toward reducing our enormous tariff schedules, which have raised the cost of living to its present high proportions. If they will agree to lower the tax on the people's shoes, we will agree to lower the tax on the manufacturer's raw hides. But when they ask for no tax on the manufacturer's raw material and at the same time compel the merchant, the farmer, the common people of Texas to bear all the burden of government, then we cry out against their unjust policy.

My friends, I have taken you to-night through the entire history of this question. Page by page I have shown you conclusively that the Democratic Party has never consistently favored the admission of raw products free; that in 1846 they opposed it; that in 1888 the Democrats in Congress favored it, but the national convention would not ratify their action; that in 1892 a declaration was made in favor of it, but the members of the party in Congress would not support it; that in 1896 it was repudiated by the national convention. I have shown you that the Texas Democracy has consistently opposed the unjust policy. Nobody, honorable judges, can justly say that we to-night are recreant to the cause. If you gentlemen of the affirmative repudiate us for opposing free raw materials, you are also repudiating the immortal men who led the Democratic Party through the most glorious years of its history, the men who have stamped their names indelibly on the honor roll of America's great. We appeal to you, my friends, to stand by the guns and fight, as you have so often fought, for the old-fashioned Democracy. Fight for it as you would fight for your country's honor. Fight for it as you would fight for the sacredness of your homes. And when the battle seems the fiercest renew your courage by casting your eyes in memory back to those who have fought and died before you. They denied the pernicious doctrine of free raw products, and well may you follow the principles of justice and liberty for which they lived and died.

[Frank Powell, negative, second speaker.]

Mr. Chairman, honorable judges, ladies, and gentlemen, my colleague has shown you that the taxing of raw materials has been the prevailing custom of the past; that this has been the policy of the national Democratic Party; that it is the view effectively supported by Texas Democracy; that this added revenue will not increase the cost to the consumer and is a tariff for revenue only, and finally that the American people have been consistently opposed to free raw products as long as there is a tariff on the other incoming goods. But we are also opposed to free raw products because, first, correct economic principles require a tax on them as long as there is a tax on other imports. Honorable judges, this question must necessarily be restricted to present conditions. Even those who have been the strongest advocates of free raw material also advocate that we have this loss of revenue made up by some new form of taxation. All suggest the income tax; but Senator BAILEY proposed it, and it was defeated by Congress and declared unconstitutional. While I believe in an income tax, yet, honorable judges, from an economic standpoint, the amount of revenue which could be raised from any new source must make the tariff proportionately lighter on both raw and finished goods. However, this question does not admit of any substitute, for anyone must know that should there arise a new source of revenue it would require a redistribution of all tariff duties. This is a political question which has arisen in view of the present situation, has been discussed under present conditions, and notice, honorable judges, that it has made for its sole claim that it would benefit the manufacturers.

But correct economic principles require raw materials to be taxed, because there is no difference between raw and finished products. No man has been or ever shall be able to furnish one sound reason for distinguishing between the raw and finished product for the purpose of taxation. Senator BAILEY says: "There is no such thing in this world as a raw material ready for the use of the machinery of man, for what is one man's raw material is another man's finished product." Honorable judges, the forests which we refer to as raw material are only so as long as they remain untouched; when the ax is applied they become finished product. The log is the finished product of the woodman, while raw material for the man at the sawmill. He converts it into his finished product, lumber, which is again raw material to the cabinet workman.

The cane and beet, while the finished products of the grower are raw material for the refiner and while sugar is the finished product of the refiner, it is raw product for the confectioner. Hides are raw material for the tanner, but the tanned hide or leather becomes raw material for the shoemaker. When wool is clipped it becomes the farmer's finished product. True, it is raw material for the weaver, out of which he finishes cloth and turns it over as raw material to the tailor. Iron ore is raw product only so long as it is uselessly lying in the bosom of the earth, but when it responds to the pick of the fearless miner it becomes his finished product, but raw material for the smelter. He converts this finished raw product into his finished product—steel—which he hands over to the blacksmith and mechanic as their raw material; and all will admit that what is the finished product of the butcher is raw material for the kitchen.

Honorable judges, when we attempt to classify raw and finished products for the purpose of taxation, we find that there is no substantial basis in justice or in fact. But could there be raw material, free raw material would be discrimination.

(a) In matters of taxes. The extraordinary increase in public expenditures in the last two decades has made it necessary for a sum of money to be annually collected so large as to almost confuse the human mind. But large as it is, and confusing as it may be, it must be raised, and should we at a single blow sweep away the millions which are annually collected from raw-material taxes the ultimate and inevitable result must be that the already increasing burden of the consumer will be made heavier by placing an extra duty upon the finished product. Under the woolen schedule the Government receives annually about $35,000,000. Of this amount those who use imported wool pay for $11,000,000, while the people who use imported woolen goods pay $24,000,000. Can anyone rightly claim that the Government remit the $11,000,000 which it now collects from those who import wool and continue to collect the $24,000,000 from those who use imported woolen goods?

Free hides is another strong cry of the free raw material advocate. The duty on hides last year yielded more than $2,000,000 net revenue to the Government, while the duty on boots and shoes yielded less than $30,000. Free hides from duty and you have handed over as a permanent gift to the manufacturer $2,000,000 annually and at the same time compelled the consumer to pay the difference. Whenever we take the duty off rough lumber, which yields yearly to the Government more than $1,700,000, we must make that amount of revenue good in some other way, and this question, as stated, does not admit of a new way. It has been argued that steel trusts own the available iron ore, and by freeing that we have cut down their profit in selling ore. In the first place this is a conflict of argument, for those who advocate free raw material make as their sole claim that it would benefit the manufacturer. But, honorable judges, steel trusts do not sell ore, but steel products, and, furthermore, Government experts show that steel corporations control less than 39 per cent of the available ore. Why, then, should we turn over to the wealthy steel producer the $10,000,000 which annually reaches our Government from the duty on iron ore? If there is any basis of reason or justice why an already highly favored class should be further favored we should be glad indeed to hear it. There are millions of people to-night who would be glad to vote for free raw material if the affirmative can produce one sound reason why one class of our citizens should be exempt from taxation while another and much larger class should be subjected to increased taxation. Honorable judges, there never was proposed a more undemocratic, un-American, nor a more unjust theory than that one which would exempt the manufacturer from the payment of a moderate duty on his raw material, while the consumer must pay a double duty for a finished product made from the same material. No one class should enjoy a special and valuable privilege which is denied to all others. Honorable judges, it is as much the farmer's right to exchange his raw products for finished material as it is the manufacturer's right to exchange his finished goods for raw material, and both of them should pay a duty or neither of them should do so. No true American will ever consent to so discriminate between the products of the farm and the products of the factory.

But what reason can an advocate of free raw material give in justification of it? It has been suggested that if the tax be removed from raw material the manufacturer can produce his goods at lower cost and thereby sell them at a lower price. In the first place, honorable judges, justice demands that we have no right to exempt the manufacturer from his share of the taxes which are required to maintain the Government, even if it were guaranteed that he would sell his goods at a lower price, and, moreover, the manufacturer does not regulate the price of his goods according to the cost of production, but fixes it the highest possible without exposing himself to foreign competition.

During the recent War with Spain an extra tax was placed on tobacco, but in order that it might ultimately fall on the consumer, the factories were permitted to make smaller plugs, and when that tax was removed they continued to sell short weight at the same price. This is an example of how the manufacturer helps the consumer when the Government helps him. Had that tax not been remitted the Government could have collected scores of millions of dollars without costing the consumer one cent more.

The remission of the tax on beer has merely been a gift of millions to the brewer, and no one would pretend that it cheapened the retail price.

The arguments first brought forth by the newspaper men to put wood pulp on the free list were not directed against the idea of a reasonable revenue tax, but against the situation which high protection had brought about. The high tariff on paper and wood pulp had resulted in the stifling of competition here at home and the charging of monopoly prices to the consumer. With a moderate revenue tax on white paper and wood pulp there never would have been an objection, according to the newspaper men themselves. The same is true about the anthracite coal demand. Boston would never have demanded that it be placed on the free list had not Pennsylvania oppressively monopolized it. Iron ore on the free list might help those who have speculatively obtained control of Cuban and other outside ore, but it would not cheapen steel and iron products.

But, honorable judges, this discrimination would be bad enough if it merely relieved the manufacturer of the taxes which by right he ought to pay, but since it transfers to all other classes the taxes from which he has been relieved, it doubly violates that Democratic principle which forbids us to grant special privileges, because it not only confers a bounty on the manufacturer but imposes an unequal burden on the consumer. There is no fair-minded man in this United States who is prejudiced against the manufacturer. We all refer with pride to his marvelous success and prosperity. But we of the negative can never accede to that pernicious doctrine to further increase his fortune by freeing him from the burden which by right he ought to bear in common with his fellow citizens. If principle could ever justify us to relieve any class from taxation it would be first those whose labors are most grievous and comforts fewest.

We will be rejoiced to increase the free list at any time the Government can dispense with the revenue. But in the extending of the free list we of the negative would place last the manufacturer who is always crying for protection. The Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate, as they arrange from time to time the rates in all tariff bills, regardless of their personal opinion on the tariff question, are compelled to keep in mind the revenue necessary to run the Government. And each schedule is so drafted that it will contribute a given amount of the total sum required. And, honorable judges, it is obviously certain that when a duty reduction is made on a particular article it must be compensated by an increase on some other article or by an increase upon all other articles of that schedule.

Since we have reversed the principle of our forefathers by now regulating our taxes by the expenditures of the Government instead of regulating the expenses of the Government by the collection of taxes, every time we change an article from the taxed to the free list we have merely relieved one class by increasing the burden of another.

Senator Samuel H. Piles, of Washington, says, "Our present revenue-producing system is certainly workable, because thousands of business enterprises have become adjusted to its exactions," and that it would be folly to forget that the principal object of revenue laws, including the whole tariff system, is to provide means by which to pay the Government bills.

Honorable judges, since all revenue and tariff laws are based on this principle, how can the affirmative propose the fallacious doctrine that the manufacturer be exempt from his share in paying the Government bills?

We are agreed that with free raw material the manufacturer can produce his goods more cheaply, and could, if he wanted to, sell them for less. But, honorable judges, that same principle is equally true for any other business man under the sun. A man of any occupation has the same right to demand relief from taxation and on the very same ground. If all agricultural and pastoral lands were exempt from taxation, the farmer and ranchman could raise their grain and stock more cheaply and could also sell them at lower cost. But when was it ever proposed to free lands and live stock from taxation in order that we might have cheaper bread and meat? Honorable judges, the fact that to free raw material would cause a smaller loss of revenue than to free the farmer, miner, ranchman, etc., does not in any sense alter this great principle. Senator BAILEY says, "If we are to exempt the manufacturer who makes the goods, why not exempt the merchant who sells the goods?" And, says he, "The proposition to filter a benefit through a special class to the general public is repugnant to every principle of democracy and violates every conception of American equality."

Honorable judges, a benefit which can not be extended to all, will never be enjoyed by all, for the class to which it is extended has always monopolized those benefits.

But free raw material would also be discrimination in incidental protection. Even if a duty be levied solely for revenue, we are aware that it will afford some incidental protection, thus giving an advantage to those who sell and placing those who buy at a disadvantage. In this we also denounce the discrimination. While our policy would be to do away with all protection, yet since this can not be done, correct economic principles demand that it be extended to the producer of raw products as well as the manufacturers of finished goods, and permit him in this way to receive back in part when he sells what he loses when he buys.

And again, more revenue can thus be raised and with less protection. By placing a duty on a larger number of articles it will enable us to make the duty lower on every article, and by thus distributing the duty over the largest possible area we have minimized and practically neutralized the evils of protection. If one-half the given sum which is to be annually collected for Government expenses were to be levied on raw imports and one-half from finished imports, the striking of one class from the dutiable list would mean to double the duty on the other class. Honorable judges, it is needless to remind you that keeping all imports raw and finished in the duty list will raise a maximum of revenue and at the same time cause a minimum of protection.

Taxed raw material is not a protective measure, and from our arguments to-night we are dealing with rates lower than Walker's revenue-producing rate. He says that tariff duties should be levied for revenue only, and should be so adjusted as to operate equally throughout the country and not discriminate between class and section. In 1845 Robert J. Walker fixed 20 per cent as an ideal revenue-producing rate. Yet every article about which there is so much discussion to make it free, is below that rate. Hides come as the highest, at 15 per cent, iron ore at 12 per cent, and lumber at 9 per cent, making an average of 12 per cent.

Honorable judges, why shall we not so distribute our duties that not only there will be no discrimination between classes of our citizens, but also that we may reduce the duty of all classes to a proportional share in supporting the governmental needs. For in the words of Senator BAILEY: "Free raw material simply means a double profit to the manufacturer; it reduces the cost of what he buys and increases the price of what he sells."

Honorable judges, every argument that has been made by the affirmative to-night is a direct or indirect plea for protection. We argue from the standpoint of the consumer—the man who makes it possible for the manufacturer to survive. Our plea is tariff for revenue only, and we base our plea upon the position of the Democratic leaders of the past, and upon the principles of American justice and equality. From every American lip has come the expression that taxation is a burden, and that as a burden it should be borne proportionately. Never will we enrich one class at the expense of all others by a protective measure, but so long as the needs of the Government must be supplied we will demand that every citizen—that every class of citizens—pay his share of these needs, and that tariff shall be levied for revenue only.

FREE-LIST BILL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in order to expedite the business of the House, I would like to ask unanimous consent to again take up the free-list bill (H. R. 4413). Of course, if it is going to bring up general debate and delay the House any length of time, I will not insist on it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not insist upon it, because it is Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not do it without unanimous consent, of course.

Mr. MANN. We can dispose of it the first thing to-morrow; it will not take very long, and it is now 6 o'clock——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think we can dispose of it in a very few minutes. However, if the gentleman indicates a desire that it go over——

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman this: The only object in disposing of the free-list bill to-night is to expedite adjournment. What can the gentleman tell us in reference to the prospect of adjournment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would have to refer the gentleman from Illinois to a House that it is not in parliamentary order to mention in this body.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it is quite in parliamentary order to mention the Senate. We do it many times—sometimes with blessings and sometimes the contrary.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will refer the gentleman to the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. MANN. Then why should we stay here at this time of the night to pass upon a matter that would not be hurt at all by waiting until to-morrow?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman objects, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama withdraws his request.

PRINTING OF VETO MESSAGE—NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

Mr. SMOOT. Yesterday, on my request, the special message of the President of the United States, returning without approval the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, was ordered to be printed as a public document, but I notice, on an examination, that last evening the House of Representatives had already ordered it printed as a public document. Therefore I ask that the order made by the Senate be annulled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order made yesterday for printing the President's message will be annulled. No objection is heard.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have received a telegram from the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] stating that he is sick and requesting the Senate to grant him a leave of absence for the remainder of the session on account of sickness. I therefore present the request in his behalf.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Maryland will be complied with. No objection is heard.

THE COTTON SCHEDULE.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 12812—the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pending amendment. I expect to divide it and offer it when the bill reaches the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No action has been taken that requires unanimous consent. The Senator from Iowa withdraws his amendment. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and still open to amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. If we are going to vote on amendments, I think there ought to be a quorum present, and I suggest the want of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cullom	Lorimer	Smith, S. C.
Bailey	Cummins	Martin, Va.	Smoot
Bankhead	Curtis	Martine, N. J.	Stephenson

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise to make the announcement that my colleague [Mr. KENYON] is necessarily absent from the city.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is in attendance on a session of the Committee on Territories at this time, and is therefore unavoidably absent.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is out of the city. He is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. I will let the announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the bill, and I desire to say a word before the amendment is read. I wish to prevent any possible misconstruction, and I now make the statement that I do not claim the credit of being the author of what is contained in the amendment. It is true that it is my property, as it was thrown overboard by the author of it; and, under the law of jetsam and flotsam, I believe, as I am the finder of it, I am the owner of it.

When the Senator from Iowa asked the leave of the Senate to withdraw his amendment I was about to object, when the Chair ruled that no consent was needed. Therefore the Senator was at liberty to withdraw it, and he did withdraw it.

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa has pressed the amendment with so much earnestness and has explained it as a proper and necessary measure with so much precision and elaborate care that I have been greatly impressed with the importance of it, and I am unwilling that it should be thrown away. While it does not entirely meet with my approval, and is much higher in the rates than I think it ought to be, still it is very much better than the present law; and while, if I were drawing an amendment and had the votes behind me to carry it according to my wishes, I would make the rates much lower, I have accepted what was formerly the proposition of the Senator from Iowa, and now offer it as my own. I shall at the proper time ask for a vote on it as an amendment to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section to the bill, as follows:

SEC. —. The Act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," is hereby amended by striking out paragraph 121 of Schedule C thereof and inserting the following:

"121. Beams, girders, joists, angles, car-truck channels, T. T. columns and posts, or parts or sections of columns and posts, deck and bulb beams and building forms, together with all other structural shapes of iron or steel, whether plain, punched, or fitted for use, or whether assembled and manufactured, one-quarter of 1 cent per pound."

The said Schedule C in the act aforesaid, being paragraphs 117 to 199, both inclusive, is hereby further amended as follows, to wit:

"From and after the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the articles mentioned in paragraphs 117 to 151, inclusive, 159 to 163, inclusive, and 171 of said Schedule C, when imported from any foreign country into the United States, or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), 60 per cent only of the rates of duty which are in and by said paragraphs of said schedule prescribed; but the foregoing shall not apply to paragraph 121, which is hereinbefore repealed and a substitute reenacted therefor."

That from and after the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the articles mentioned in paragraphs 152 to 158, inclusive, 164 to 170, inclusive, 172 to 199, inclusive, of said Schedule C, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), 70 per cent only of the rates of duty which are in and by said paragraphs of said schedule prescribed: Provided, however, That if any article embraced in said schedule shall by an act of Congress passed by the Sixty-second Congress, second session, be placed on the free list, this act shall not apply thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I need hardly say that I am heartily in favor of the proposition contained in this amendment, as I myself drew it. I withdrew the amendment, as I stated, intending to divide it, and to offer it to the bill when the bill reached the Senate. I withdrew it in order to enable the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to offer, first, his amendment by way of substitute for the cotton bill passed by the other House. I think all Senators understand that I did not withdraw the amendment because I had lost faith in its merits. I expect and hope to see it adopted before the bill passes from the Senate.

I wanted simply to make this explanation as to my reason for withdrawing it, which was solely to divide it first into two parts. It would be divisible anyway on the request of any Senator—first, that part which covers what is ordinarily known as tonnage iron and steel, upon which I seek to reduce the duties 40 per cent; then upon the remaining paragraphs of the metal schedule, which relate to other metals and to the finer forms of manufactured iron and steel, upon which I seek to reduce the duty 30 per cent.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa did not, in withdrawing his amendment, propose simply to make a modification. It is true he said something about what he had in view for the future; but, so far as the bill now pending before the Senate is concerned, it was an absolute withdrawal of the amendment. The party with which I am associated has been impressed with the conviction that the metal schedule should be amended, and that the opportunity should be taken advantage of in the pendency of the present cotton bill to offer this as an amendment to the bill. When the Senator from Iowa withdraws it as an amendment, there is nothing for us to do but either to see the bill acted upon without that amendment being offered or to ourselves offer it.

Mr. President, the Senator alludes to what his purpose is when the bill gets into the Senate. I think we all understand what that means—that the Senator is assuming that this bill is to be defeated, and after it has been defeated it is going to be presented in another shape, and that then the Senator will give it his support in the offering of an amendment. That does not satisfy those of us who think as I do. We think that the amendment should be offered to the bill now pending. What shall become of that bill afterwards is another question. For myself, I am not voting for this bill to put myself on record, but I am voting for it in the effort to pass it. Therefore I submit amendments to it in good faith, as if the bill is to pass. If it is not to pass, it shall not be my fault nor the fault of those who think as I do. If the amendment which I have offered is not attached as an amendment to the bill as it now stands, it will not be our fault. We have offered the amendment in good faith; we propose to vote for it; and we shall be very glad for all of those who believe in the amendment to vote for it, and not run the risk of having a chance to vote for it when something which they anticipate may not occur.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Georgia, does the amendment which he offers relate to the chemical schedule or any part of it?

Mr. BACON. No, sir. I will state to the Senator, and also for the information of other Senators who may not have been present when the amendment was first offered and when I stated the nature of it, that it is an amendment to Schedule C of the tariff law, to wit, the metal schedule—the iron and steel schedule. It is in terms the amendment which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] formerly presented, offering it as an amendment to the bill, and which he withdrew this morning, and which, as I have said, became flotsam and jetsam. As the finder of it, I became the owner of it, and I have introduced it in my own name and in my own right as an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask the Senator, is he offering the amendment because it relates to cotton itself or its uses, or does he offer it as a separate matter referring directly and only to commodities covered in another schedule?

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will repeat that question, because the first part of it was stated in such a low tone that I did not catch it.

Mr. WARREN. I wanted to ask the Senator whether he offers that amendment because it has a particular reference to the cotton bill or the cotton industries, or whether he offers it because he wishes to re-form another and entirely different schedule?

Mr. BACON. I want to re-form the schedule.

Mr. WARREN. As a separate measure?

Mr. BACON. I want to re-form that schedule; and, as the Senator asks the question, I will state very frankly what our attitude is in regard to the matter. The information is within our possession, entirely reliable and definite, that the House of Representatives now has in course of preparation an amendment to the iron and steel schedule which is not yet entirely completed. On account of the shortness of the session, as they may not have the opportunity to complete their bill in the other House and send it to us in time for us to act on it, without keeping us here for a much longer time than most of us desire to remain, it is deemed wise and opportune to take advantage of the pending measure—the cotton bill—and engraft upon it legislation which shall greatly reduce the tariff duties upon the iron and steel products coming into this country. It is for that reason, in good faith, not as a matter of form and not for the purpose of embarrassing the measure, but for the purpose of expediting legislation upon this most important matter, the importance of which has been most earnestly and deeply and graphically impressed upon us by the Senator from Iowa—it is for the purpose of securing it as a piece of legislation that it is now offered as an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have no doubt whatever about the good faith of the Senator from Georgia. I withdrew this as an amendment to the cotton bill, which is now before the Senate, because I do not intend to vote for that cotton bill. I intend to vote for the cotton bill that will be proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. But I assure the Senator from Georgia, as well as all Senators, that there will be ample opportunity to vote for the reduction of the duties on iron and steel before we have finished the consideration of this bill.

Mr. BACON. What is the bill to which the Senator alludes? I did not know that it was within the power of a Senator here to introduce a bill in regard to revenues. The Senator says "the bill of the Senator from Wisconsin."

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Georgia, I suppose, understands that the Senator from Wisconsin will offer it. It is now on the table.

Mr. BACON. The Senator means an amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. An amendment by way of a substitute to the cotton bill passed by the House. It is that bill for which I intend to vote, and I desire this metal schedule to be attached to that bill, if it receives the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator repeats over and over again the word "bill." The Senator means amendment, does he not?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I mean an amendment, although it is in itself a complete revision of that schedule.

Mr. BACON. That is the reason I made the inquiry of the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In the absence of that Senator on account of illness, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I desire to announce that I am paired with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. If he were present, I should vote "nay." I make this announcement of the pair for the day.

Mr. MYERS (when the name of Mr. DAVIS was called). I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. If the Senator from Arkansas were present, he would vote "yea" on this amendment. I make this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I transfer the general pair I have with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE], who is necessarily detained from the Senate. I make this announcement for the entire day. Upon this question I vote "nay."

Mr. BURNHAM (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). My colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. LODGE's name was called). I am requested to announce that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. McLEAN (when his name was called). I desire to announce that I am paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who is necessarily absent. I assume that if present the Senator from Oklahoma would vote "yea." If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. NIXON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. I do not know how he would vote if present, and so I withhold my vote.

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when Mr. STONE's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. STONE] is unable to be present on account of sickness. He is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. TAYLOR (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], who is absent on account of illness. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to say that the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] is paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. If the Senator from North Dakota were present, he would vote "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] is recorded as voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he is not recorded.

Mr. WATSON. Then I desire to withdraw my vote and to announce a general pair with that Senator.

Mr. FOSTER (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. FOSTER. I have a pair with that Senator and therefore withdraw my vote.

So the amendment of Mr. SIMMONS was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to offer an amendment. In offering this amendment I want to say that I have had an expert of the Treasury Department to reduce everything in this schedule to an ad valorem basis 25 per cent—not down to 25 per cent, but 25 per cent less than the rates in the Payne-Aldrich bill. If anybody desires to inquire as to a reduction, I have it here in figures.

I have also a glossary prepared by the Treasury Department showing each article and what it is used for, and if any Senator desires to inquire about it, he may. I will have the Clerk read that after he gets through reading the amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. In addition to having that glossary read, I ask that it be printed as a public document. Those matters are very useful.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes. It only shows what these different articles are used for.

Mr. BAILEY. Precisely so; but that is very useful to every man who seeks to familiarize himself with the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order to print asked for by the Senator from Texas will be entered. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add a new section in the bill, to follow the amendment just agreed to, on page 7, as follows:

SEC. —. The act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," is hereby amended by striking out all of Schedule A thereof, being paragraphs 1 to 83, inclusive, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

SCHEDULE A. CHEMICALS, OILS, AND PAINTS.

1. Acids: Acetic or pyroligneous acid, not exceeding the specific gravity of 1.047, 10 per cent ad valorem—

Mr. OVERMAN. For the benefit of the Senate I will say that is reduced from 13 per cent to 10 per cent.

The Secretary read as follows:

Exceeding the specific gravity of 1.047, 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is reduced from 24.87 per cent.

The Secretary read as follows:

Acetic anhydrid, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is reduced from 13.05 to 10.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. OVERMAN. In the Payne-Aldrich bill it is 92 per cent.

The Secretary read as follows:

Chromic acid, 10 per cent ad valorem; citric acid, 15 per cent ad valorem; lactic acid, containing not over 40 per cent by weight of actual lactic acid, 15 per cent ad valorem; containing over 40 per cent by weight of actual lactic acid, 25 per cent ad valorem; oxalic acid, 25 per cent ad valorem; salicylic acid, 20 per cent ad valorem; sulphuric acid, or oil of vitriol, not specially provided for in this section, 5 per cent ad valorem; tannic acid or tannin, 50 per cent ad valorem; ballic acid, 20 per cent ad valorem; tartaric acid, 20 per cent ad valorem; all other acids not specially provided for in this section, 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. OVERMAN. Unless some Senator desires the reading of the whole amendment, I will state, so that everybody may understand it, that the rates are reduced 25 per cent. I ask that the further reading be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the further reading of the amendment will be dispensed with.

Mr. JONES. What is the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. OVERMAN. Unless some Senator desires the further reading of the amendment, I do not insist upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina asks that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. HEYBURN. If it is to appear in the RECORD——

Mr. JONES. I want to ask if this amendment has ever been read in the Senate?

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. OVERMAN. Read it, then.

Mr. HEYBURN. Unless that request is coupled with the request——

Mr. OVERMAN. I withdraw the request.

Mr. HEYBURN. That it be printed in the RECORD——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is withdrawn.

Mr. HEYBURN. We will never know what the amendment is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is withdrawn. The Secretary will continue the reading of the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. In order that Senators may know what these articles are used for, I ask the Secretary to read the paper I send to the desk, so that every Senator may understand the amendment. Nearly all the articles are used in dyeing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROOT in the chair). Without objection, the paper will be read.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will just ask that it be put in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JONES. I ask the Senator how he expects anyone to understand it if, before we vote on the amendment, it is printed in the RECORD without reading?

Mr. OVERMAN. It is not an amendment. It is an explanatory paper, showing that nearly everything in the list is used in dyes.

Mr. JONES. I do not object to it. I merely asked the Senator how he expects us to understand it without its being read?

Mr. OVERMAN. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina now request that the paper be read?

Mr. OVERMAN. On the adoption of the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HEYBURN. Before the question is put I should like to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina whether he has had an estimate as to the effect on the revenues that this reduction would make?

Mr. OVERMAN. I have not. I only know that it is a reduction of 25 per cent. That is all I know about it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Still, this is one of the largest revenue-producing schedules, and 25 per cent would amount to a good bit of money. I did not know but that the Senator was prepared to state the amount which the revenues would be affected by the reduction.

Mr. JONES. In the statement read I did not hear anything about any investigation having been made as to differences in the cost of production in this country and abroad, or the effect of this reduction upon the revenues or upon the industries; but it seemed to be simply a statement showing what the various articles are used for. Has the Senator any statement showing the effect of the amendment?

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no statement, except I know that it is a horizontal reduction of 25 per cent, after having been reduced to an ad valorem basis.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator think that his amendment is on purely revenue lines?

Mr. OVERMAN. I mean that it is a reduction from the Payne-Aldrich law of 25 per cent. That is all it is.

Mr. JONES. Without investigating it, the Senator has arbitrarily made a——

Mr. OVERMAN. Twenty-five per cent.

Mr. JONES. A 25 per cent reduction without any consideration as to its effect upon the industries of the country or the revenues of the country.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Washington will permit me a moment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JONES. I yield the floor. I simply desired to have some information.

Mr. BACON. I wish to make a reply to the Senator.

Mr. JONES. The Senator can do that in his own time.

Mr. BACON. Before he yields the floor, I wish to state the purpose of the Senator who proposed the amendment, as I have been informed, in consultation had with his colleagues. Congress has already acted upon what we know as the wool bill, and it is proposed to act upon the cotton schedule, in the manufacture of which most of these articles enter. The purpose is to reduce the cost of the manufacture at the same time that we are endeavoring to reduce the cost to the consumers of the articles which they use.

Mr. JONES. As I understand it, this proposition has never been considered by any committee, and the amendment was never read in the Senate until to-day. No explanation has ever been given of it. I simply thought that that would indicate, at least, to the country the very careful consideration that this great legislative body is giving to these propositions which affect a tremendous industry of the country.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I wish to inquire whether this amendment has ever been printed.

Mr. BACON. Oh, yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. It has been printed and laid upon the desks of Senators.

Mr. DIXON. How long has it been printed?

Mr. OVERMAN. It was introduced August 12.

Mr. BACON. Five days.

Mr. OVERMAN. Five days.

Mr. DIXON. There has been no explanation of it or debate until this morning.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has been fully explained. It is a 25 per cent reduction. That is a sufficient explanation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, upon which he demands the yeas and nays. Is there a second?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, before the demand for the yeas and nays is acted upon, I think Senators want to express themselves on this subject and to have some explanation of it. I know others do and I do.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I simply desire to say, so far as the cotton schedule is concerned, that is a matter which has been the subject of very careful consideration; the steel schedule, which was originally offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], has been a matter of very careful consideration; the sugar schedule, which is also expected to be offered as an amendment, has also been the matter of very careful consideration; but here is a measure which has had no consideration. While I voted for the other amendments, I for one would not vote for a schedule as broad and as far-reaching as this without some time, either to give it consideration myself, or that it should have consideration at the hands of those who have made it their business to give it consideration, so that their assurance might go with the bill with reference to its probable effect.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. BACON. I want to say, Mr. President, that I have heard the Senator from Minnesota for several years in the most elaborate manner discuss the enormities of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, and I think, from the views I know that Senator has had with reference to that law, that he would very readily recognize that a cut of 25 per cent on the rates of any of those schedules would not be a very dangerous thing to undertake or to carry into execution.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, one trouble with the Payne-Aldrich law was that it struck down some interests with as ruthless a hand as it did, with a greedy purpose, raise other schedules and other items. There are some things in that law that are very plainly and manifestly unjust. Take the wool schedule, and it is absolutely indefensible; and every Member of the Senate, it seems to me, must have known that; but the wool schedule, at least, was thoroughly debated by men who had made it a study. The cotton schedule was thoroughly debated by men who had made it a study; the enormities of the sugar schedule had been exposed here, and no effort has ever been made to answer those exposures. I would be ready to-day to vote on the wool schedule, on the sugar schedule, on the cotton schedule, on the lumber schedule, or on the steel schedule, all of which were thoroughly considered and some of which have been again thoroughly considered at this session of Congress.

As I recall it, the schedule covered by the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] did not receive that consideration. I for one do not believe in voting blindly upon measures here. So far as the wool schedule is concerned, there never has been any question, nor has there been in regard to the sugar schedule, nor has there been in regard to the cotton schedule, nor has there been in regard to the steel schedule, or the lumber schedule. While as to those matters which were thus debated and gone into we may not reduce to the lowest basis to which they could be safely reduced, we may very safely make reductions; and that is what we have done and what we propose to do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator think it will injure anybody to reduce the duty on chloroform from 6 per cent to 5 per cent?

Mr. CLAPP. I have no idea about that, and that is why I do not want to vote for it. I am not familiar with the subject of chloroform. For one I never have had it administered to me. I believe there was some reference two years ago to its use here in the Senate, some reference to its being administered to some Senators. It may be that chloroform needs no duty, but what I object to with reference to this schedule is that we are dealing with something that we have not had any consideration of as to whether or not it needs a duty. I do believe that before men vote upon a question they ought to be satisfied that it is at least reasonably safe to do so. I am simply speaking for myself; I do not know how others propose to vote on this matter. I voted without any hesitation to put the steel schedule on the bill, and I will vote to put the sugar schedule on the bill, because those are matters which have been gone over time and time again here until it is patent to every man that there is injustice in those two schedules that ought to be corrected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not want it to appear from the statement read, with reference to the use made of these chemicals, that that is a complete statement as to the purpose for which these chemicals are used. I followed as closely as I could the rapid reading. The occasion does not seem to demand a review of the statement in detail, but I think in a few minutes, were I to take the time, I could point out that the uses indicated by the statement read are of minor importance. I think I will base the accuracy of my statement upon this, that not 10 per cent of the chemicals, including the list read, are used in any way in connection with the cotton or woolen industry. I make that statement with some knowledge of the facts.

In view of the fact that this is one of the most important of all the tariff schedules, so far as revenue is concerned, it is a pretty reckless proposition to reduce the duty 25 per cent, regardless of the effect that it may have upon the revenues alone; and if it were to go out from this body as an accurate statement that only those purposes were served by the use of these chemicals, it would be a misleading statement. I have the figures, and they fully sustain my statement, if any Senator controverts it. I have the returns under Schedule A before me, including the quantity and value of the importations and the amount of duty collected. The value of the importations in 1909, covered by the chemical schedule, was $37,063,773, and the amount of duty collected was more than $10,000,000.

I will not pursue it further than to make the general statement as given in the summary of Schedule A. There is also something over $30,000,000 in the wage item alone.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to add one word to what I have previously said. Of course we are dealing here with the cotton schedule. The duties on chemicals in a measure affect that schedule, and I can readily understand how a revision of the cotton schedule, perhaps, would require a modification of the chemical schedule; but I want to say to those interested in the cotton schedule that, so far as I am personally concerned, I am ready to stay here, and I believe it is our duty to stay here, and take these things up. My objection is to voting for a measure of this magnitude without knowing the details of it. Nor do I think we should be deterred from voting and passing these schedules because of any talk as to what will be the fate of these bills. That is none of our business. It is our concern to perform our business as Members of the Senate, and, for one, I am willing to stay here until we can take these things up and give them consideration and study.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the pending amendment proposes a revision of the entire chemical schedule. When the so-called reciprocity bill was pending I offered an amendment to the woolen schedule and an amendment to the cotton schedule. At that time I proposed no reductions in the chemical schedule, although chemicals are used in both cotton and woolen manufacture. I felt at the time that perhaps some explanation was due to the Senate, but as no question was raised regarding it, I did not then discuss the matter.

In the preparation of the amendments reducing the duties on woolen and cotton manufactures it led to the consideration of reductions in Schedule A as to certain chemicals and dyes. I took counsel of the best expert assistance I could find. It at once became clear that the chemical schedule is perhaps the most difficult schedule in all the tariff upon which to attempt revision. You can scarcely change a single duty of that schedule without its necessitating a nice readjustment of very many, if not all, of the other items of the schedule. Whether working out a revision as a protectionist or upon a revenue basis, the responsibility is the same.

But, Mr. President, in dealing with the woolen and cotton schedules the whole matter was simplified when I learned from the experts that the chemicals employed by the manufacturer would be less than a fraction of 1 per cent of the cost of the finished product. That very greatly relieved my mind, and knowing, as I do, that the duties of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law are excessive throughout those schedules, I felt perfectly sure, Mr. President, that no one need concern himself about the necessity of reducing the duties upon chemicals that entered into the process of manufacture both in the woolen and cotton industry. For that reason, sir, and because, as I said before, you can not deal with the chemical schedule without the most extensive and elaborate study, with the aid of the very best experts, I shall vote against the amendment.

Now, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has stated that he reduces the duties here but 25 per cent. I am confident that many of the duties in the chemical schedule would stand a reduction very much more than that.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree to that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I believe there are items in that schedule which would not stand even as much reduction. There may be some items in that schedule that could not be reduced at all without impairing that measure of duty which I believe should be maintained in order to put the labor employed in the industry in this country on a basis of equality with that of other countries.

But the whole subject of the chemical schedule is one so intricate and so complicated, and its relation to the cotton schedule is such that I have no hesitation whatever in voting to reject the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on the question of agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia offers an amendment which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. Add a new section to read as follows:

SEC. —. That the articles mentioned in the following paragraph, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada, when imported therefrom into the United States or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), shall be exempt from duty, namely:

Coal, bituminous, round, and run of mine, including bituminous coal such as will not pass through a three-quarter-inch screen: Provided, That the articles in the paragraph enumerated, the product, growth, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada, shall be exempt from duty whenever the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence and shall make proclamation that the articles in this paragraph enumerated, the product, growth, or manufacture of the United States, or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), are admitted into the Dominion of Canada free of duty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. I offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri offers an amendment which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 2 insert the following proviso:

Provided, however, That if the duties above provided to be collected and paid shall as to any article or articles be greater than that provided to be paid by the present existing law less 30 per cent, then in every such case the duty or duties which are hereby levied and which shall be collected and paid on said article or articles shall be a sum equal to the duties provided to be levied, collected, and paid by the present existing law less 30 per cent, and not greater.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the yeas and nays on the last amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. REED. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri offers another amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 20, after the word "are," insert "in so far as they conflict with this act," so that it will read if amended:

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are, in so far as they conflict with this act, hereby repealed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not see the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] here. The Senator from Kansas has proposed an amendment in reference to the sugar schedule. It is a proposition for which I voted heretofore when the Payne-Aldrich bill was under consideration. I believe in it.

I am convinced that that amendment ought to be adopted. I do not see the Senator from Kansas here. So I propose to offer this amendment myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington offers an amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. Insert the following as a new section:

SEC. —. That on and after the day following the taking effect of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the following articles, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), the following rates of duty, namely:

Sugars, tank bottoms, sirups of cane juice, melada, concentrated melada, concrete and concentrated molasses, testing by the polariscope not above 75°, ninety-five one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound, and for every additional degree shown by the polariscopic test up to 98°, thirty-five one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound additional, and fractions of a degree in proportion; and above 98° by the polariscopic test, 1 cent and seven hundred and fifty-five one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound; molasses testing not above 40°, 20 per cent ad valorem; testing above 40° and not above 56°, 3 cents per gallon; testing above 56°, 6 cents per gallon. Sugar drainings and sugar sweepings shall be subject to duty as molasses or sugar, as the case may be, according to polariscopic test: Provided, That nothing in this section contained shall be so construed as to abrogate or in any manner impair or affect the provisions of the treaty of commercial reciprocity concluded between the United States and the Republic of Cuba on the 11th day of December, 1902, or the provisions of the act of Congress heretofore passed for the execution of the same.

Mr. JONES. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think we are on the eve, at any rate, of doing some very dangerous things without due consideration. The Constitution did not ill-advisedly provide that revenue measures should originate in the House of Representatives. There is a House over there, and its committees are working just as rapidly as can be upon the various schedules of the tariff bill. I am willing to vote upon anything which has been considered there or is being considered there, so that by the time a bill with an amendment from here gets there, they will have considered the subject matter of the amendment.

For that reason I wanted to put the metal and steel schedule upon the present bill, because the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives has considered that and will have a metal schedule ready by the time the bill gets to them; so that it will have received due consideration.

I do not believe that any one man can give due consideration to any great schedule of the tariff bill, no matter how able he is. I have had some experience serving upon committees dealing with tariff questions, and I have for the most part found that my own opinion, when I first went into the consideration of a question, became modified very much by the information and the suggestions I obtained from 13 or 14 other men serving upon committees.

Speaking for myself, therefore, I am not willing to be put on record as indorsing amendments containing page after page of tariff schedules, when I know that they neither have been considered at the other end of the Capitol nor can be considered by the time the amendment reaches the other end of the Capitol.

The rubber schedule is very iniquitous in many regards. I could go out and draw up in a half hour amendments satisfactory to me, at any rate, concerning it. The sugar schedule, especially that part of it which deals with differentials, is very obnoxious to me. But for myself, I shall not vote to put upon this bill anything except things that either have been considered in some committee somewhere, especially at the other end of the Capitol, or such things as we know will be considered by the time the amendment dealing with the subject reaches the House of Representatives.

I wanted to make that statement in justification of the votes I am to cast from this time on. In illustration of how rapidly and how inconsiderately we are going, we a moment ago adopted an amendment saying, after we had fixed the schedules on a certain subject, "if anything in this schedule is not 30 per cent less than existing law, it shall be reduced to 30 per cent." It passed when Senators were not listening.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly; I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. DIXON. Does the Senator apply that same yardstick to the chemical schedule which he just voted for?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not apply it to the chemical schedule, but I ought to have done it, to be frank with the Senator. But the chemical-schedule amendment was one which could be easily understood.

Mr. DIXON. It is the most difficult in the whole law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a reduction of 25 per cent; and I was of the opinion, from the information I have concerning the existing chemical schedule, that there is no item in it that could not stand a 25 per cent reduction without doing detriment to justice or fairness. I therefore voted for it; but I confess I was partially led to vote for it by the circumstances under which it was offered. While it is a chemical schedule, the amendment was offered because of its connection with the cotton goods, the dyes, and things used in connection with cotton manufacture, and was germane and relative to the question. In a certain sense it might be considered as a part of the cotton schedule—I mean in a legislative sense. I did vote for it, and I am inclined to think that I made a mistake when I did it, not because it could not stand the 25 per cent reduction, but because it broke the precedent of requiring some committee consideration somewhere of these great questions before they are hastily put through.

Of course, when a man offers here to put coal on the free list that requires no committee consideration. I know what it is; everybody can understand it; it is a simple and plain proposition, and requires no investigation of schedules or comparison of schedules or any nice distinction between one duty and another. So, if propositions of amendments are presented, I may vote for them, but I am not going to vote to put three or four pages on the statute book of schedules which have been considered by nobody completely except the proponent of the amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I understand that while I was downstairs at the lunch room for a few moments the amendment which I offered some days since, and is on the table, providing for the reduction of duty on sugar has been offered by the senior Senator from Washington. Of course, I am very anxious that there should be reductions made in the duties on sugar and that the amendment should be adopted, but I do not wish to have it attached to a bill that I can not vote for. I had hoped that when the cotton bill was considered here by the Senate the Senators who believed in a reduction of duties could get together and make reductions in the excessive duties that now exist and also take out of the tariff law some of the iniquities of which we have all complained. But it is clearly manifest here this morning that it is not the intention of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber to support measures which can receive the support of the Republicans who are commonly called "insurgents" or "progressives." There is an effort here to embarrass some of us by attaching to a bill that we can not support amendments to the tariff law which we earnestly desire to have passed.

I want to say, for one, that the Democratic Senators and the regular Republican Senators in this Chamber can not embarrass me in that way. I stand here—and, I believe, consistently—for a reduction of excessive duties; and in advocating that I have pursued a consistent course; at least, I think I have. I will not be a party to any cheap political trick to accomplish anything that I am earnestly desiring, especially when the apparent accomplishment means its certain defeat.

I believe in the principle of protection. I believe it has developed the industrial life of this country in a marvelous way. I believe that without it our country's industrial condition would have been far lower than it is now. But I believe that while we have been enjoying the benefits of a protective tariff there have been worked into that tariff duties that contribute not to the welfare of our industrial life, but to the exorbitant profits of many concerns that do not need it and should not have it.

Whenever there is an honest effort here to get at these iniquities and take them out of the tariff law, I will be found voting to help to do it; but there is an effort here now to prevent a reduction in the duties on cotton by presenting a bill that, if passed, will be passed because Senators believing in excessive and exorbitant duties refused to vote in order that the bill may pass in a form that it will be impossible for it to become a law. I do not propose to be a party to any such scheme as that. I am going to vote against this amendment because it will not be put upon this bill in the interest of tariff reduction, but to prevent a reduction in the important tariff schedules that Senators on the other side are now undertaking to protect.

Embarrass me! No. I can vote against this amendment as readily as I would vote for it if there was an honest purpose to enact it into law.

I believe that we ought to meet this proposition fairly. A majority of the Senators in this Chamber believe in the principle of protection. A minority do not, but believe in a tariff for revenue. A minority believe in as high duties as the "traffic will bear." A small minority believe in the protective principle that shall carry duties that measure the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. The progressive Republicans stand here ready to vote for such duties, whether they are offered by Republicans or Democrats, provided they carry out that principle, which is the policy that was declared for in the Republican national platform. We will stand for it whether it affects industries in our own States or not. We do not undertake to disguise our purpose. For one I will vote against any tariff duty that does not measure up to that standard, if I know it. I will vote against any tariff duty that goes beyond it in an excessive degree.

If there is a majority here who believe that such duties are better than those that now exist, they ought to be adopted. It is known that a majority of Senators in this Chamber do not believe in a tariff for revenue only.

I do not think it is necessary for me to go into any elaborate discussion. I have tried to make myself understood by this plain statement. I had hoped that before this day passed we should have secured some substantial reduction in a number of excessive duties in the Payne-Aldrich tariff law; but to start out on a haphazard, ill-devised reduction of every duty, whether it has been considered by a committee or by the Senate, regardless of the effect it may have upon the industries of the country or its revenues—to start out on such a program as that, if that is the purpose, I must be counted out, for I am not in favor of that kind of a tariff revision.

Though I shall vote against this amendment because it is offered as an amendment to a bill which I can not vote for if the amendment was adopted, so that I would have to vote against it at some time, I prefer to do it now.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as far as I am concerned, I have not offered this amendment for the purpose of embarrassing any Senator. I sent for the Senator from Kansas and inquired whether he expected to offer the amendment, and he said he did not expect to offer the amendment. Therefore I thought the amendment ought to be offered, because I believe in it.

When I was a Member of another body of Congress I voted to remove the sugar differential. I went so far as to overrule a decision of the chairman, who is now the honored Vice President and presiding officer of the Senate. When the Payne-Aldrich bill was under consideration I was convinced that the substance of this amendment should be adopted, not only that the differential should be removed, but that the Dutch standard proposition should be done away with. I was convinced of that very largely by the arguments of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. I voted to remove it when that bill was under consideration. So I am in favor of this amendment. There is only one bill pending before the Senate to which the amendment can be offered, and that is House bill 12812, the bill to which it was proposed by the Senator from Kansas that the amendment should be offered.

I did not know why the Senator from Kansas had concluded not to offer the amendment. The reasons which are good to him and appeal to him now were sufficient, so I offered the amendment upon my own responsibility, because I believe in it, and because the only bill to which it is very likely it can be offered is the bill now under consideration.

I do not say I will not vote for the pending cotton bill, but I do propose to vote for every amendment that I think will improve the measure. It seems to me that the only theory upon which we can consider a measure before the Senate is that when germane amendments are presented to it those amendments should be considered on their merits, even though we may be opposed to the original proposition. Every amendment that we think will improve the measure should command our support. Upon that theory I propose to vote for it.

I have voted for some amendments that have been offered to the bill because I believe they improve the measure. If this legislation is to become a law—and it is not for us to say here except by our votes that it is not—then it should be made as nearly perfect as possible. I voted for the steel amendment because I believe in it, because the reasons that have been presented here and the investigations convinced me that that was a good amendment and ought to be adopted. For the same reason I have offered this amendment, and I propose to vote for it.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I regret very much the difference of opinion upon this question. I think if there was ever an iniquity perpetrated in legislation it was the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, and I have never missed an opportunity to aid in the amendment of that law within the limit of what I was satisfied was a safe change.

When it comes to a tariff schedule, I undertake to say that a Senator called upon to vote on the question has after all to depend very largely upon his own convictions as to whether it is a safe rate or an unjust rate. There are certain broad fundamental principles that can be applied. We can take the condition at the close of the depression which existed from 1893 to 1897, and, measuring the increased consumption by the American people with the increased exportation as against our own consumption, we can within some degree of safety say whether the duty on that article is sufficient or not.

I have always maintained that it is the duty of a Senator to use his best efforts to perfect a measure whether in the last analysis he could vote for the measure or not. Whether I shall vote for this bill or not will depend upon what may yet be done with the bill. But if there is one thing with reference to the American tariff that I am absolutely satisfied of it is that of the iniquity of 1909 the sugar schedule stands out almost without a peer. It is a subject that has been so thoroughly discussed, not only at this session, but at that session, that for one I am ready to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] and now offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

I believe it is my duty as a Senator to perfect this measure just as far as possible. It is the only measure pending to-day upon which we can attach a measure to remedy the iniquities of the sugar schedule under the Payne-Aldrich tariff law.

Therefore, differing, as I must, from some of my colleagues, I believe it is my duty to vote to put this amendment upon the pending bill. If the bill with that amendment and no additional amendment comes to a vote I believe I shall then vote for the bill. The only thing upon the bill up to this point that I would hesitate upon is the chemical schedule, not because I apprehend that it is a mistake, but for want of more definite information as to what it will do. The American people are expecting relief upon the cotton schedule, and I would afford that relief even though it involved voting for something which as an independent proposition I would not vote to put upon the bill.

So primarily believing that it is the duty of a Senator to assist in perfecting the bill, I shall vote to add the sugar schedule as I voted to add the steel schedule, and with reference to those things which enter into the machinery for the making of cotton goods. In all probability, unless the bill be still further amended in some way which I can not accede to, I shall vote for the bill itself.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I appreciate the position which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] takes. He always does what he thinks is the right thing, and he is a man of fine judgment. But when I sit here on this side of the Chamber and a leading Senator on the Democratic side comes over here and suggests to the Republican regulars that they abstain from voting so that the Democratic measure will carry, and when I know that that Senator is bitterly opposed to the reduction of the duty on steel and on cotton, it exposes an arrangement here that I do not intend to be a party to, directly or indirectly.

I propose to vote against any amendments from now on upon this bill as it is now. When leading stand-pat Senators on this side of the Chamber tell me that they do not intend to vote in order that the Democrats may carry their revision through, knowing that it is the best way to prevent a reduction of duties that they want to maintain, and when Senators on the Democratic side who are interested in maintaining high duties on cotton and steel cooperate in the way I have just described, you must count me out of the proposition; I am not into the scheme.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to say just one word. Of course I take nothing the Senator said to myself, because, fortunately, I have not been on the other side of the Chamber to-day, but I want to say it is well known that the rates of duty the Senator from Kansas and those who are cooperating with him wish to have incorporated in this bill are much higher than the rates of duty in the bill as it came from the House, which we support.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas has made a declaration here that is very startling to some of the Members on this side.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me an interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. KERN. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator had been here two years ago, this statement would not have been startling nor would the facts have been startling. It is an old experience to those who have been here before.

Mr. KERN. I hope by the time I have been here two years I will be wise enough to observe for myself any such conduct as has been indicated by the Senator.

But I want to know at this stage from the Senator from Kansas whether it is possible that he has personal information that any such arrangement or conference has been had and made between any Senator on this side and the leading Republican stand-pat Senators on the other. If he has, it is but fair to those of us who honestly desire a reduction of the steel schedule, and who honestly desire a reduction of the schedules all along the line that he make known any such arrangement.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will say to the Senator from Indiana——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Kansas will excuse me, I will suggest that having made that statement, he owes it to the Senate to name the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will state to the Senators from Mississippi and Indiana that the Senator on the Democratic side I referred to was the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], and he had the conversation I referred to with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I can plead an alibi to the charge the Senator from Kansas refers to.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] came over to the Republican side not long since and suggested to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] that if the Republican regulars abstained from voting the Democratic bill would carry. The Republican regulars abstained from voting, and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] was one of them.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I believe that after the dreadful performance, if the so-called regulars had not voted, there was a comment made of that kind, but it occurred after the vote. It could not have occurred during the vote or before it, because as soon as I answered to my name and explained that I could not vote on account of my pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] I went out to the telephone and talked with a party in Pennsylvania. So the Senator is laboring under a serious hallucination and his embarrassment is extremely painful to his brother Senators. He voted to enact into law a measure which is neither protective nor free trade, which is neither a revenue producer nor one thing or the other. It must necessarily have brought the Senator from Kansas to this lamentable condition, and it is a lamentable one before the people of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. I am stating the facts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I desire to affirm what the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has said. I desire to say in addition that so far as I am concerned I desired to vote for the House cotton-schedule bill, and did so; and so far as the iron and steel schedule is concerned, I intended to vote for it in the shape that it was offered or in any other shape that would reduce the duties, because I am not only in favor of a reduction of those duties to a revenue basis, but I am heartily of the opinion that in the Birmingham district where we produce iron and steel, and produce it cheaper than in any other section of this country or the world, if we went to a free-trade basis our industries would prosper.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Alabama pursued a very strange course and has formed a strange alliance for one who is anxious to have the duties on those articles reduced. The statement I made a few moments ago in regard to the arrangement I stand by. The conversation was overheard in this part of the Chamber by Senators other than myself, and a number of Senators, in harmony with the understanding among the Republican regulars, have abstained from voting, and have given the reason suggested to a number of their colleagues for their action. The RECORD will show whether or not they voted.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I desire to contribute what little I know with respect to this alleged transaction. After the conference took place between the two Senators, which I saw, but did not hear, I heard the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] immediately afterwards say to another Senator on this side of the Chamber, "We do not want to vote on this proposition."

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the Senator from California is entirely correct in his statement. I have not participated personally in any of these proceedings for the last 10 days, and have so advised my colleagues who were in sympathy with me. I did not sign the report of the conferees, nor did the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. I have been entirely willing to see this bill perfected by the friends of the measure, who have been the Democratic Party and the so-called insurgents.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, just to change the subject before it gets to be too broad and vitriolic, I will say I noticed the remarks of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], and, if I understood him aright, his statement was that he felt that the iron industry in the locality which is nearest home to him would be able to manufacture its product and deliver it at lower prices than any other locality, and that it needed no protection.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I want to remind the Senator that two years ago we heard very much such talk as that from the shoe manufacturers in this country—that, if they had free hides, they would lower the price of shoes, and would need no protection. I want to ask the Senator from Alabama if he has not since then observed the agony with which they seem to be enveloped now when it is proposed to make boots and shoes free? And did he observe the fact that prices were not reduced on shoes when they got free hides, but were raised instead?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I have heard some remarks of that kind. I only want to say that my judgment is that the Birmingham district does not require any protection to the manufacturer of iron or steel, but we can go on and compete with England or any other foreign nation and prosper in the industry.

Mr. WARREN. And does the Senator feel that those manufacturers will not flood the mails with literature and letters and be found in the corners of the Capitol to wait upon Senators, as the shoe manufacturers have been regarding their products when reduction or abolition of protective tariff is proposed?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I do not know exactly what will be the result, but I am not for free trade at all in any respect.

Mr. WARREN. If I felt that we had a great locality that could produce the iron and steel product we need without protection, it would be an agreeable assurance, and it would give me great pleasure if I could be sure that the afterclap, the second thought and remorse after it was done, would not pursue us, as has been the case on the occasion to which I have referred and in regard to the duty I have mentioned, as well as some others.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I think if all the duties were taken off it would result in lower prices to the consumer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. LODGE's name was called). I am requested to again announce that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when Mr. STONE's name was called). I again announce the unavoidable absence on account of sickness of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], and state the fact that he is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. If he were present the senior Senator from Missouri would vote "yea."

Mr. TAYLOR (when his name was called). I again make the announcement that I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The roll having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 33, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. JONES was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there other amendments to be offered as in Committee of the Whole? If not, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin desire to offer an amendment to the bill as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, including the amendments adopted, and to insert as an amendment what I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to know whether it is competent or permissible to strike out, while the Senate is in Committee of the Whole, amendments that have just been adopted as in Committee of the Whole, and which can not be amended?

The VICE PRESIDENT. As a substitute, it is permissible. If the substitute had been offered before the bill was amended, the original text would then have been open to amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but I was under the impression that while we call it a substitute it is really an amendment, and that we can not strike out that which we have just adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. An amendment can be offered as a substitute for the whole bill striking out all after the enacting clause. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill as amended and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the amendment which I have offered proposes reductions in existing duties, and, on the whole, reductions less than those proposed in the House bill. It is well for us, Mr. President, at the outset of whatever discussion there may be before the final vote is taken in Committee of the Whole, to speak plainly.

The Democrats, contending for a reduction of the tariff to a revenue basis, are in control of the House of Representatives; they are not in control of the Senate; they are a minority here; and they can not hope to enforce upon this body a tariff bill based upon a tariff for revenue principle. They have had the opportunity to demonstrate in the House of Representatives the line to which they would reduce the tariff if they controlled both branches of Congress. They have sent to the United States Senate a bill revising the cotton schedule. It comes here to a body in which there is a diversity of views. The Democrats are in the minority; the Republicans are in the majority; but upon the tariff question the Republicans are divided. A majority of the Republicans in the United States Senate would not—and I think I do not misrepresent their position—make any reduction in the duties as they are fixed by the Payne-Aldrich law. There are a few Republicans here, 12 or 13, who believe that the increased duties made in the tariff revision of 1909 were a violation of the Republican platform pledges; who believe that tariff duties should in no case be greater than the difference in the cost of production here and abroad; taking into consideration always the differences existing in the condition of labor in this country as compared to that of competing foreign countries.

Capital can well take care of itself, but the laborer is powerless, is helpless, and upon him falls the first tariff reductions that go below the line of the difference in the cost of production here and abroad. Capital is strong enough to protect itself always. If anybody suffers it is the laborer. Believing, as the group of men in the Senate called Progressives believe, that a tariff is necessary to the preservation of the higher condition of life which surrounds labor in this country as compared with competing countries, we can not consent, Mr. President, to a reduction of tariff duties below what we believe a safe margin, measuring the difference in the cost of production here and abroad.

That difference in cost is chiefly, almost wholly I believe, the difference in the labor cost. It is not so great as has been represented. The data bearing upon this point has been largely furnished heretofore by interested parties. During the consideration of tariff bills they have appeared before the congressional committees and, as a rule, their statements as to the difference in the cost of labor in this and the competing point abroad have been accepted.

Mr. President, two years ago I was amazed to find that many of the same statistics that had been used before the McKinley Ways and Means Committee, of which I was a member, away back in 1889 and 1890, were given weight in the last Congress in the hearings before the House committee; and yet the wage scale of foreign labor has been steadily advancing through all those years. But, Mr. President, the most authentic information available bearing on the question proves that there is a difference in labor cost. The report of the Moseley Commission, which visited this country a few years ago—a commission composed of representatives of the different industries of Great Britain, disinterested men, who themselves worked in the factories and who were sent here on a tour of inspection—shows that the difference in labor cost measures the difference in production cost in this and competing countries. Recognizing this difference the progressive Republicans on this side can not consent to a tariff reduction which cuts below the line fixed by such information as we have at the present time.

I confess that this is not all that can be said with reference to the cost of production. Many complex questions enter into an accurate determination of production cost, and it is for that reason that progressive Republicans here and in the other branch of Congress contended in the last session and have urged for years the establishment of a tariff commission, clothed with adequate power, a permanent nonpartisan commission composed of experts competent to determine the question. But, as I say, Mr. President, we know from the information that is available that in order to protect the laborer of this country we must preserve a line of difference. The Republicans upon this side, standing for tariff reductions—in so far as we have offered amendments reducing tariff schedules—have sought to frame them in the light of the best information existent at the present time. We believe that we have done that; and it finds us on a different tariff level than that fixed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, first of all let us consider our responsibility to the public. It is to be determined here within the next hour or two whether the Democrats and the progressive Republicans can agree upon some measure that will offer relief to the people of this country upon the cotton schedule and such additions to it as we may be able to make. The Democrats have demonstrated their position according to principle on the bill which they have passed through the Democratic House of Representatives and now before the Senate. They can go to the country and say, "These are the tariff reductions which we would give the people if we had the majority power in both branches of Congress. The bill we have passed in the House of Representatives indicates the level at which we would fix duties upon our first tariff revision, but being a minority in the Senate we could accomplish no legislation excepting as we joined with those who were in favor of reducing the present high duties, and thus did our part toward lifting some of the burdens from the people of this country."

Mr. President, the Democrats have demonstrated their adherence to the tariff principle. The progressive Republicans have their principle, and must demonstrate here on this floor and in their vote upon this schedule, their adherence to that principle. And we ask you to join with us and to support this great reduction provided for in the amendment which I have submitted, a reduction which in round numbers amounts to 48 per cent below existing duties. In view of the Democratic platform which pledged, as I remember it, gradual tariff reductions, you would be entirely consistent, it seems to me, in giving your support to this very material reduction in the existing duties of the cotton schedule.

Mr. President, I would not mislead any of my friends upon the Democratic side. In my amendment I have not sought to effect a compromise between a tariff for revenue and a protective tariff. I have no duty fixed in this proposed amendment lower than what I believe will be necessary to measure the difference represented in the level of the conditions surrounding labor in this and competing foreign countries.

Now, I wish to speak more definitely as to the amendment proposed.

According to the preliminary report of the Census Bureau for 1910 the value of products, exclusive of knit goods and hosiery, manufactured in the cotton industry was $616,297,000, as against $442,451,000 in 1905 and $332,806,000 in 1900, or an increase of 85 per cent during the last decade and nearly 40 per cent during the last five years.

The cotton industry in this country has enjoyed such protection of its markets that it has gone on and on expanding and filling the field of production until in 10 years it shows an increase of 85 per cent.

The wages paid out in the cotton industry in the year 1909 were $129,768,088. That is to say, the labor cost constituted 21 per cent of the total cost of the products. This bears out the generally accepted estimate that the labor cost does not exceed 25 per cent of the total cost of cotton goods. With free raw material, even if providing for a protection of 100 per cent on the labor cost, this could not justify a duty higher than 25 per cent ad valorem.

For the reasons which I indicated when discussing my amendment to the woolen schedule I propose in the amendment that I offer at this time to err on the safe side and to give the manufacturer the benefit of any doubt, thus preventing the possibility of too sudden a change in the condition surrounding the cotton manufacturing industry.

Even if we knew the exact line of difference in the American and foreign production cost, with the excessive duties we have maintained in this country so many years, it might produce too great a transition and result in too great a shock at one step to make the complete reduction necessary to come to the proper level of duties. But I do not think there should be any extended interval between these reductions, and I think we should act with all possible haste, considering economic and financial conditions in this country. Reductions in duties should be made step by step until we reach a basis measuring the exact difference in the cost of production.

The amendments submitted by me, therefore, are designed to provide for a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem on cotton yarns and thread; 20 per cent on unbleached cotton cloth; 21 per cent on bleached; 22 per cent on dyed, printed, and otherwise finished cotton cloth, and 35 per cent ad valorem on manufactured articles made from cotton cloth.

The present average rate on cotton yarns and thread is a fraction over 32 per cent, representing a range of from 10 per cent to 76 per cent. The rate proposed would, therefore, result in an average reduction of 12 per cent ad valorem. Thus the effect of the proposed amendment would be to raise the duty on certain kinds of yarn, and to lower it on many kinds of which this country produces but little, if at all. In the case of the large and prosperous mills which spin their own yarn, the change in the duty will have no effect, since they are not obliged to buy their yarn in the market. As regards the smaller mills and most of the knitting mills which buy their yarns in the market, the reduction of 12 per cent ad valorem of the average duty on yarns should be of advantage. There is no reason why it should affect detrimentally the interests of the yarn spinners, since the proposed rate is more than sufficient to cover the difference in the cost of production in this country and abroad.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, we imported less than $10,000,000 worth of cotton cloth of all kinds and exported over $20,000,000 worth. The cloth exported was sold in oriental and South American countries in competition with England, Germany, and other leading European countries under conditions of absolute equality where the American manufacturers had no tariff to protect them from the competition of those countries. It can not be contended that the American manufacturer, protected by a duty of 22 per cent ad valorem on the finished cloth, in addition to the cost of freight which the foreign manufacturer has to bear in shipping his goods to this country, and by his proximity to the domestic consumer, his knowledge of his tastes, and complete command of the market, can be in the slightest danger of losing the American market to foreign competitors.

The average duty under the present act on cotton cloth is a fraction over 43 per cent. The proposed rates, speaking of the one item in the bill, would represent an average reduction of 21 per cent ad valorem. The loss in revenue under the proposed rates, on the basis of the importations for the year 1910, would amount to less than $900,000 in the case of cloth and some $200,000 for thread and yarn, or a total loss of $1,100,000, or about one-third of 1 per cent of the total revenue collected from customs.

The adoption of the proposed amendment introducing an ad valorem rate for all cotton cloths would eliminate at one stroke the complex cotton-cloth schedule which has given rise to endless litigation in the past, involving the Government and the importers in the expediture of millions of dollars, all of which is ultimately paid by the people of the country. It would expedite and simplify the collection of the revenue. The greater part of the present litigation over customs matters is caused by disputes over textile schedules, and especially the cotton schedule.

Coming down to the details of the amendments proposed:

Paragraph 313 is to be greatly simplified by providing for a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem on cotton card laps, roping, sliver, roving, and cotton thread, and yarns of all kinds. This eliminates paragraph 314 of the present act.

The exceedingly complicated classification of cotton cloth provided for in paragraphs 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, and 320 is to be done away with by the substitution of a simple provision which reads as follows in the proposed amendment:

Paragraph 314. Cloth made of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, not bleached, 20 per cent ad valorem; bleached, 21 per cent ad valorem; dyed, colored, stained, painted, or printed, 22 per cent ad valorem.

Paragraph 321 (new paragraph 316), referring to cloth composed of cotton and silk, but chiefly of cotton, is to be changed to provide a duty of 35 per cent ad valorem. This duty is to apply to articles containing silk in which cotton is the component material of chief value. If the silk added to it even as a minor element considerably raises its value, the duty will be correspondingly raised since the application of the ad valorem rate will automatically result in a much higher specific duty on this article than that on cloth composed entirely of cotton. In the second place, raw silk is admitted as freely to this country as is raw cotton. No question, therefore, of a compensatory duty is involved in this item. In the third place, the duty I propose would be uniform with the other rates of the cotton schedule.

Paragraph 322 (new paragraph 317) relates to handkerchiefs and mufflers composed of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value.

"Handkerchiefs" is but another form of cloth, and there is no reason why it should be subject to a different rate of duty than cloth. The present average ad valorem equivalent on handkerchiefs, according to the report of the Bureau of Statistics, from which I have already quoted, is 59 per cent. The proposed duty would therefore amount to a reduction of 29 per cent ad valorem, which is more than justified in the light of the insignificant importations, which amounted to $453,000 in round numbers in 1910. The amended paragraph also provides for a duty of 35 per cent on handkerchiefs and mufflers embroidered or trimmed with lace.

Paragraph 323 of the present act, which provoked so much indignation at the time of the enactment of the present tariff by providing for extra duties on mercerized cloth, extra duties for so-called lappets, or extra filling threads in forming a figure on the cloth, is to be entirely eliminated. With the tariff placed on an ad valorem basis, there is no necessity for specific provision to that effect. If the presence of lappets or mercerization increases the value of the cloth the same ad valorem rate will automatically yield a larger duty, as the value of the cloth is increased.

Paragraph 324 (new paragraph 318) which, in the present act, provides for a duty of 50 per cent ad valorem on clothing and wearing apparel made of cotton, is to be changed by providing for a duty of 35 per cent ad valorem, resulting in a reduction of 15 per cent ad valorem, or 30 per cent below the present duty.

Again, what I have said elsewhere as to the automatic increase of the duty under the ad valorem system with the increase in the value of the article on which it is imposed, applies in this case.

The same consideration applies to other manufactures of cotton, such as plushes, velvets, curtains, and tapestries, which are dealt with in paragraphs 319 and 320 in the proposed amendment.

We now come to hosiery, which in the present tariff act is provided for in paragraph 327, imposing a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem, and in paragraph 328, imposing various specific rates on hosiery classified according to value.

My amendment calls for a uniform duty of 35 per cent ad valorem on all hosiery under paragraph 328 (new paragraph 322) and leaves unchanged the 30 per cent duty under paragraph 327 (new paragraph 321).

Mr. President, I do not object to conversation in the Chamber, if it is just in a little lower tone; and I ask the Chair to suggest to Senators who are conversing that they speak in a little lower tone.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that is a very considerate suggestion on the part of the Senator from Wisconsin, and it should be complied with. All Senators desiring to carry on conversation kindly do so in the lowest possible tone of voice.

Mr. BORAH. Or not at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Or not at all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The report of the census for 1909 shows that in hosiery, as in the case of other cotton goods, the wages do not exceed 25 per cent of the total value of the product. The proposed rate of 35 per cent ad valorem should therefore prove as amply protective in the case of hosiery as in that of cloths and other cotton goods. The same consideration applies to gloves, shirts, and other knitted underwear, for which I have provided in the amendment, under paragraphs 323 and 324.

Paragraph 330 of the present act (new paragraph 325), relating to a great variety of cotton wares and specialties, has retained on the whole the wording of that paragraph, but I have substituted a uniform duty of 35 per cent ad valorem on all articles, except belting for machinery, made of cotton or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, on which the present act imposes a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem and which I have retained intact.

To the articles already contained under the present wording of that paragraph I have added a provision that rugs, carpets, and mats made of cotton or other vegetable fiber, or of which cotton or other vegetable fiber is the component material of chief value, shall be dutiable at 35 per cent ad valorem. At present these goods are provided for in paragraph 393 of the woolen schedule, where they do not logically belong, subject to a duty of 50 per cent ad valorem.

The proposed rate will therefore result in a reduction of 15 per cent ad valorem, or 30 per cent below the present rate. In addition to these, the amended paragraph enumerates specifically lace and articles made of or trimmed with lace and various trimmings and embroideries all made of cotton or in chief value of cotton to be dutiable at 35 per cent ad valorem. Under the present act these articles are dutiable under paragraphs 349 and 350 of the flax schedule at 60 per cent and 70 per cent ad valorem. There is no reason why goods made of cotton should be tucked away in the flax schedule, along with similar articles made of linen and silk. So far as the proposed rate of 35 per cent ad valorem is concerned, it is more than ample as a protection measure, if it is considered that the census of 1905 shows that the entire labor cost in the manufacture of lace is equal to 26 per cent of the total cost of manufacture of lace. In other words, the proposed rate, though cutting the present rates in half, is 9 per cent in excess of the total labor cost and exceeds by much more than that the difference in cost at home and abroad.

Paragraph 331 (new paragraph 326). For the reasons explained in connection with the other cotton goods, the present duty of 40 per cent on cotton table damask is reduced to 35 per cent in the proposed amendment of that paragraph.

The present duty of 45 per cent ad valorem on all manufactures of cotton provided for in paragraph 332 of the present act is likewise reduced to 35 per cent in paragraph 327 in the proposed amendements.

Finally, new paragraph 328 provides for the imposition of the same rate of 35 per cent ad valorem on all goods made of artificial or imitation silk or imitation horsehair. Neither imitation silk nor imitation horsehair belong logically to the silk schedule, to which they have been attached under the Payne-Aldrich Act in paragraph 405. It is more logical to class them with cotton, as they are made of a cheap fiber known as cellulose, artificially derived from wood or straw, and are made for people who can not afford to buy real silk.

It is just that thing, Mr. President, that is bringing the whole protective tariff system to the verge of destruction. Some of the worst enemies of a legitimate protective tariff are to be found within the Republican Party—the men who have imposed upon the people of this country exorbitant and extortionate duties, resorting to every trick of language in framing tariff schedules as to conceal here and there provisions that result in enriching manufacturers at the expense of the people of this country.

The transfer of these goods to the cotton schedule involves the repeal of paragraph 405, which is provided for in section 6 of the proposed amendment.

Without attempting to revise the flax schedule at this time, the overhauling of the cotton schedule makes it imperative to eliminate from the flax schedule all the provisions which subject cotton goods to duties originally meant for articles made of linen. Section 6 of my proposed amendment provides for striking out the word "cotton" wherever used in the flax schedule. This provision along with the amendments to the cotton schedule which I have proposed will restore all goods made of cotton or of which cotton is the component material of chief value to the cotton schedule, known as Schedule I, where they belong.

The only other change proposed by me to Schedule J, or the flax schedule, is to strike out entirely paragraph 350, which provides for a duty of 70 per cent on all laces and embroideries made on the Lever or Gothrough machines. This provision was not contained in any of our older tariffs. Under the Dingley tariff all laces were subject to certain duties irrespective of the machines on which they were made. Neither the bill as introduced by Mr. Payne in the House nor as originally reported to the Senate by Mr. Aldrich contained that paragraph. At a later stage, however, it was inserted, providing for a duty of 70 per cent on laces made on the Lever and Gothrough machines, as against 60 per cent on those made on other machines or by hand, and an additional protection was offered to manufacturers of lace under paragraph 197, putting the Lever and Gothrough lace-making machines on the free list up to January 1, 1911. During the 17 months the machines have remained on the free list nearly three million dollars' worth of these machines were imported by American lace makers, but the extra duty of 10 per cent ad valorem over and above the duty on lace made on other machines or by hand still remains. There is no reason why extra protection should be granted on lace made on a machine which saves more labor than other machines. If anything, the duty should be less. The only favor the manufacturers can reasonably ask for is to be given access to these machines, which are not made in this country.

Mr. President, the changes which I have proposed with respect to flax and silk are not found in the pending House bill. It is a matter which, I presume, chanced to be overlooked there.

Now, summing up the proposed changes in just a few words, the average ad valorem rate on all cotton goods, including artificial silk, is to be reduced under the proposed amendments from 55.59 per cent under the present act to 28.94 per cent, representing a reduction of 26.65 per cent ad valorem and over 52 per cent below the present rate. It is difficult to estimate the effect these reductions would have upon the revenue derived by the Government from these sources. A reduction of duty may result in an increase of importations which will not only offset the reduction in rate but bring in a larger revenue than the old higher rate did. Of course this is not always the case, since the manufacturers may reduce their price to the consumer and thereby prevent increased importations from abroad. What usually happens and what would probably happen if the proposed amendments were adopted would be a combination of both conditions, and it is impossible to foretell what the ultimate effect upon the revenue would be.

As against a possible loss of revenue to the Government, what benefit awaits the consumer as a result of the proposed changes in duties?

I arrive at this reduction in the following manner: I have computed the foreign value, assuming that the domestic price was increased by the amount of the duty. Adding to the amount of our domestic production of cotton manufactures in 1909, as given by the Census Bureau, the amount of imports for the same year, and deducting from that the amount of our exports, we have a net consumption of cotton manufactures valued at $839,000,000. The proposed reduction of duty under the cotton schedule is 26.65 per cent ad valorem. Assuming that the price to the consumer is to be reduced to the same extent, this would give a reduction to the consumer of over $150,000,000.

Now, Mr. President, that, stated roughly, is the effect of the amendment which I propose. I think it has been rather a hopeful sign to the people of this country that after the Democratic Party had demonstrated its party principle in the House of Representatives as on the wool schedule, it joined in the Senate with those who stood ready to make reductions and go as low as they could possibly go in order to give the largest measure of relief attainable to the people of this country. I believe that the action of the Senate on the woolen schedule met with the approval of all right-thinking people in this country.

But, Mr. President, I regret that as we approach the consideration of the cotton schedule a different condition appears in the Senate. Woolen manufacture lies principally in the North—cotton principally in the South. A majority of the mills of this country are in the South.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not the spindles.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. More than half of the cotton mills of this country, as shown by the census, are located in the South.

Mr. OVERMAN. I admit that, but I spoke as to the spindles.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I speak as to the mills.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is, as to the number of mills?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, sir; I am giving the number of mills.

Mr. OVERMAN. But not as to the spindles.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I heard no complaint, Mr. President, from anyone upon the Democratic side that we were making too great haste in reduction of the duties upon woolens. I heard no suggestion, sir, from anyone upon the Democratic side that we were not taking account of the cost of chemicals, in so far as chemicals are involved in the manufacture of woolens, and that there should be reductions in the chemical schedule at the same time and as a part of the reductions in the woolen schedule.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow an interruption?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask the Senator if, in his wide experience in regard to these matters of wool and cotton, to which he has evidently given great attention, the woolen manufacturer does not have to use a larger proportion or a larger quantity in cost of chemicals than the cotton manufacturer in producing his product?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think, Mr. President, there is no doubt about that.

Mr. WARREN. It commences with the scouring of the wool and goes all the way through, and yet no effort in this direction was made to protect the woolen manufacturer.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It goes clear through the whole process.

Now, Mr. President, I do not propose to indulge in strictures. But I appeal to the Democratic side to support the proposed change in the cotton schedule exactly as you supported the wool schedule as a practical legislative proposition, notwithstanding the fact that there are in Alabama 51 cotton mills, in Georgia 116, in North Carolina 281, and in South Carolina 147. Out of a total of 1,323 cotton mills in this country there are 673, or more than one-half of them, located in Southern States.

Mr. President, I hope when the final vote is taken that the record of the Senate will not show the attitude of the Democratic Party to be different with respect to tariff affecting industries located in the South than their position regarding industries located chiefly in the North. We have an opportunity to make reductions here that will greatly relieve the people of this country from the extortionate duties imposed upon them under the Payne-Aldrich law—never justified, as we contend.

Mr. President, I appeal to the patriotism of Senators on this floor to unite upon some basis which will in a measure remove these excessive tariff duties.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator has it, he will give the whole number of spindles.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The data furnished to me by the Census Bureau is as follows:

The number of cotton mills in the United States, according to the latest returns made to the Census Office, was 1,323 in the year 1909. Of these 673, or more than one-half, were located in the Southern States. The cotton mills located in the Southern States are as follows:

Alabama	51
Arkansas	2
Georgia	116
Kentucky	4
Louisiana	2
Maryland	16
Mississippi	14
North Carolina	281
South Carolina	147
Tennessee	17
Texas	13
Virginia	10

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles; recedes from its amendment to the amendment of the Senate No. 8, and agrees to the same; and recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 5 and 7, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

THE FREE LIST.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 5 and 7 to the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, which were, in amendment No. 5, line 4, to strike out the word "corn," and in amendment No. 7, line 4, to strike out the word "corn."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN subsequently said: Mr. President, an hour ago, when the amendments to what is known as the farmers' free-list bill came from the House of Representatives and were presented to the Senate for its action, there was no roll call or demand for a roll call. I merely rise to register myself against the action that was taken, having had no opportunity to vote upon the question.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am directed by the Committee on Territories to report a joint resolution for the admission of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 57) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to enable the people of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

THE COTTON SCHEDULE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, after what has transpired here this morning, as far as I am concerned, I do not propose to leave any possible implication that, if an arrangement was made with Senators upon the other side who are opposed to tariff reduction by the terms of which they were to absent themselves from the Chamber to the end that amendments might be adopted and the cotton bill finally killed, such arrangement was made with my knowledge or consent. I do not know what may have taken place, but I say to the progressive Republicans, and I say to the stand-pat Republicans and to the country, that so far as the Democrats are concerned—and I speak for every man on this side of the Chamber who attended our conferences—no such agreement or arrangement was authorized. Speaking for myself, if an agreement of the character indicated was entered into, I distinctly and unequivocally repudiate it.

I have noticed for some time in one of the Washington daily papers an attempt to fasten the name "the unholy alliance" upon the Democrats and the progressive Republicans. That statement, I presume, is based upon the fact that we have voted together in some instances when we had to vote together in order to accomplish anything. I never make complaint at the witticism of a newspaper writer, but I want to say now that if the press is looking for something in the nature of a real, simon-pure, blown-in-the-bottle, all-wool-and-a-yard-wide unholy alliance, it would be found in a combination between any living Democrat and those who are willing to perpetuate the enormities of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law.

I trust nothing of this kind has transpired; I trust that the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from California are mistaken in their inferences, and that in fact there has been no attempt made to kill this cotton bill by loading it down with any kind of amendments intended to kill it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. REED. I do; certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to say to the Senator from Missouri that there is no possible mistake on my part. There are a number of Senators here who heard the conversation, and heard other Senators state why they were abstaining from voting.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Kansas will pardon me, but I prefer to pass on without further reference to this very unpleasant subject.

Mr. President, what seems to me to be the plain duty of this Congress is to remain here in session and revise every schedule of the tariff with due deliberation, with the extremest care, but with a fixed determination to finish the work, and to do it at the present session of Congress. I say now to those Senators who pay me the compliment of their attention that the difficulty confronting us at this hour arises largely from the anxiety to quit a job when that job is half finished. It is true the President called this extra session because he wanted to have passed a reciprocity bill with Canada, but it is also true that the moment we were convened in session the responsibility devolved upon the two branches of Congress to perform their duty to the public with reference to any public business.

Every man who has studied the tariff at all knows that you can scarcely touch one schedule without making it necessary to revise other schedules. So every man understands that when we changed the tariff relations between ourselves and the Dominion of Canada it became necessary as a matter of justice and equity that we should go further and pass other measures as a complement to the reciprocity bill.

That meant, Mr. President, the enactment of the free list. Every man who voted for the free list knew that as he had put certain articles of manufacture upon the free list he ought to go further and at least reduce the tariff upon those materials used by the manufacturer, whose goods had been placed upon the free list. So having "put our hands to the plow" it was our duty to go on "without turning back."

Now, Mr. President, having accomplished a part of the work, anxiety to get away from this Chamber, to seek the cool lakes of the North or the seashores of the East, the desire to be relieved from labor that has, of course, been burdensome, is leading Members to undertake at this time to interfere with what they would otherwise have considered the orderly course of procedure.

Had we all been willing to remain, this is what would have occurred: The cotton bill would have reached here in due course. There would have been the certainty that it would be followed by other bills from the House. A bill reducing the steel and iron schedule would have arrived in due course. We would have known absolutely that it would be followed by a bill reducing the tariff upon chemicals. That would have arrived here in due course, and we would have known that it would be followed by other bills reaching all the other schedules of the tariff. And so we could have well sat here upon the Democratic side and asked the Democrats to support these House measures as they came, and insisted that the insurgent Republicans should do no more than to amend each measure so as to increase the tariff to a point where they could vote for the bill. They would have had no right to add to it other schedules and matters foreign to the subject matter of the bill before us.

But in order to get away, in order that we may lay down our duties, we are willing here now to add to the cotton bill a large number of schedules that ought to have received the distinct and careful consideration of each House and that ought to have been passed as separate measures. I protest against these methods. I protest against adjournment. I call upon every man who loves his country better than he considers his own ease, who would rather serve his people than consult his own convenience, to stay here and finish this work—to finish it now.

We are told that the President proposes to veto all tariff legislation that may be presented at this session. I do not speak as one having authority, for I am not in the confidences of the Chief Executive, but I apprehend that no Senator will rise in this Chamber and say that William H. Taft has ever declared that he will veto every tariff bill passed at this session of Congress, because, sir, if he were to make that assertion he would place himself in a position before the American people which could not be defended and would not be justified in the forum of American conscience.

Why, sir, it has been said that the reason to be assigned in these threatened vetoes is not that the present tariff bill is perfect. If that were the President's position, he might issue such an ultimatum and stand upon it. We are informed that the President declares there shall be no revision until five men constituting the Tariff Board shall render their conclusions. That statement, in its last analysis, is equivalent to a White House decree that the House of Representatives, with its 391 Members, fresh from the people; the Senate, with its 92 Members, bearing the commissions of their States and of their people, all these who represent the sovereign people of the United States, into whose keeping the Constitution has consigned the welfare of this Republic, shall halt and stand dead still until five men appointed by a President shall return their findings upon a question of fact.

If the President takes that indefensible position, and persists in it; if he has the temerity to say to the legislative branch of the National Government, "You shall not act on these great public matters until the good will and the good time of a board composed of five men shall permit you to act," he will condemn himself. If he stubbornly persists in thus placing a mere board above Congress, and refuses to allow the representatives of the Nation to proceed with the public business, such conduct would warrant his impeachment as the enemy of the American Constitution and the American Republic.

I, sir, give more credit to the President than to believe he will take so monstrous a position. If he does not, then what is our plain duty? It is to sit here in council and revise this tariff bill to the best of our ability; to send it to him schedule by schedule; and then, if he can send to us messages convincing us of our error, we will yield; or if he send to us a message that simply bars our progress on one reduction, we must stop on that one matter; but such a message furnishes no reason why we shall yield the duties, the prerogatives, and the rights of the Congress of the United States.

I have no patience with a man who will not fight until the last ditch on any proposition of right. I have nothing but contempt for any body of men who will go whining from the field of duty at the first sign of opposition.

Ah, there was a day, Mr. President, when men stood in this Chamber and in the other end of this Capitol who insisted that the legislative department of the Government was the department that created law and levied taxes. They stood here and contended without the permission of any President. They refused to surrender the rights of their people simply because a President dared to say them nay.

I appeal to the Democrats. You and I, sir, have gone up and down this country and on a thousand platforms have declared that the "special interests" wrote the Payne-Aldrich tariff law. We declared it to be a measure so iniquitous, so outrageous, so inexcusable, that it amounted to nothing more than legalized pocketpicking. We told the people they were the victims of this oppressive and dishonest scheme of plunder. We said to them, "If you do but give to us the badge of authority we will fight your battle for you." We did not say we will fight when the snow is on the ground and enlist for a winter campaign alone. We did not say we would contend only when the breezes were soft and sweet and scented with the breath of the flowers of springtime. We did not tell them we would be summer soldiers and sunshine patriots. We said we would stand and fight for them, and as they suffered we would suffer with them and contend for them to the end. And now you want to adjourn this body that you may go home to the fleshpots of your native States.

I say that, so far as I am concerned, I will vote to stay here until the people's wrongs are righted, even though this extra session should run into the regular session of next winter and that should extend until the law adjourns us on the 4th of March, 1913. Then I will be willing to quit and welcome the Democratic President, who shall come bearing deliverance in his hands.

There is another class of men who want to adjourn. They are those who are typified by the defendant of the criminal at the bar of justice. There has never been a lawyer yet who stood to defend a guilty wretch against the law's strong hand but always applied for a continuance. So the defenders of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law are asking for a continuance until next fall. These assign the flimsy pretext, the ridiculous pretense, that they can not possibly vote with intelligence until the Tariff Board shall shed upon the dark and shadowy questions of tariff schedules the light of its wondrous learning.

How did you vote before? Upon what information did you base your action when you plunged your hands deep into the pockets of the American people? Where is the information you then had that you do not now possess? What has wiped out the wondrous fund of knowledge that you then claimed to be masters of?

Why can you not do now as you did when you wrote the Payne-Aldrich bill—call in the protected manufacturers, have secret meetings with them, permit their experts to furnish you with information? You now admit this is the way the present tariff law was constructed. Why must you now wait for the Tariff Board? The answer is, because postponement of the day of trial means postponement of sentence, perhaps escape altogether. It also means the prolongation of the present scheme of legalized larceny. So you are asking for a continuance. And now they tell us the President, who denounced the woolen schedule of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law as an indefensible thing, insists we shall submit to being robbed and plundered for months, possibly years, longer in order that we may have the advice of a Tariff Board. We must not touch the robber until alleged experts shall have advised us just how to take hold of his precious anatomy, lest we, peradventure, handle him too rudely.

So the President and all standpatters in chorus cry, "Softly, good friends, be gentle with the rogue."

Now, who are this Tariff Board? I would not cast a single reflection upon them. I trust and hope that they will bring to us some knowledge; and yet, sir, all they are for is to glean the facts. Not a single conclusion are they to draw. They are to find the cost of production here and the cost of production there; they are to ascertain the amount of goods that are manufactured here and the amount of goods manufactured there; and every single fact that they can glean lies at our door, and all men who have industry can acquire all this board will ever gather. When these five men are through with their labors, I venture the prediction that they will have found little we did not already know.

Ah, but some one says, we want to know the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. That theory, my good insurgent friends, is one that you will find, like the will-o'-the-wisp, flees and flits before you. You will never overtake it. It will evade your grasp, lead you into an intellectual quagmire, and vanish from your bewildered vision. The reason for it lies in the great fundamental fact that the cost of production in one mill in this country is frequently greater than the cost of production in another mill just across. The great Senator—and I love to call him that, and I mean what I say in its most complimentary sense—from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has demonstrated that in the paper business there are mills in the United States that can far undersell the mills of Canada, and that there were other mills in the United States in which the cost of production mounted above the Canadian cost. Difference in cost of production! Where will you place it, sir, and upon what will you base it? Will you by law represent the difference there is between the incompetency of B and the competency of A, between the well-organized factory of C and the badly organized business of D? You certainly can not compensate for incapacity or lay a tribute on the people because some man employs bad machinery or bad business methods. You must not tax A because B is a fool.

If, then, we come to the question merely of wages, the difference between wages here and abroad, if we get down to that, the La Follette amendment will cover the difference, if difference there be, three or four times over. The present House bill will cover that alleged difference two or three times over. So in the House bill we have a bill that does, two or three times over, represent all of the honest difference in the cost of production here and in Europe there can possibly be.

I stand here for the House bill, and will unless and until it goes down in defeat. If it goes down in defeat, I say to you progressive Republicans on the other side, if I can not get you entirely into the church, clear up to the chancel rail, clear to the mourner's bench; if I can not put the light of the grace of God into your hearts so that you shall see your way clearly to the perfect truth, I am willing, though you are going but halfway along the road, to travel with you as far as you are going in the right direction.

Democrats, we will contend to the end for the House tariff bill. We will seek to substitute it for the Payne-Aldrich iniquity; but if we are defeated, we must then choose between the bill offered by the Senator from Wisconsin with its substantial reductions and the infamies of the present tariff law.

If across the back of my good friend the wicked lash of injustice is being laid a hundred times each day, I would like to save him all the pain and all the agony of every blow; yet if I can do no better than to reduce the size of the whip and the number of the lashes, I will do that in the interest of humanity and of my friend.

So, if I can not give the people complete relief by the enactment of a Democratic tariff measure, then I will give to them such measure of relief as is afforded by the bill proposed by the insurgent Republicans. Better a little water for a fainting man than none at all. I will not deny to hungry lips the loaf of bread which I can give because I am not able to set forth a feast. I would rather consent to the robber taking half my goods than be compelled to yield all I possess.

So, if an unjust tax is to be wrung from me, I prefer to pay a burden of 30 per cent rather than one three times as great.

Because certain amendments originally offered by insurgent Republicans and temporarily withdrawn by them were offered without their consent by other Senators, these insurgents and their confrères are threatening to vote against the very amendments they have advocated, and upon the passage of which their hearts are really set. Republicans—those of you who are not like Ephraim, joined to your idols—I put this thing to you; I put it also to the Democrats; how can we hesitate to stand and do our duty, our whole duty, without petulance, without proceeding in temper to assassinate the measures we know are for the people's benefit? How can any of us refuse to vote for a proposition simply because it was presented by some other person than we desired to bring it forward? Can we refuse to support a good measure because the manner of its presentation clashed with our wishes and sense of good taste?

I appeal to insurgent Republicans and to Democrats to consider the fact that it has been admitted on this floor by a Republican member of the Finance Committee that for weeks the Republican members of that committee held secret sessions. It was admitted that at these secret sessions the men who were interested in the great protected industries were present. They were admitted in secret to construct a tariff bill in secret. They were admitted by the Republican portion of the committee, some of the members of which were directly and financially interested in making the tariff robbery as great as possible.

So, in secret, where no eye could observe their movements and no ear could hear their proceedings, they created a public law to be enforced against the public—the public which was not admitted and which was not permitted to be heard. They did all this in the darkness. Men love darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil. Behind locked doors the Republican members of the Finance Committee joined in conspiracy with the men interested in despoiling the people. These conspirators brought forth a bill that taxes every infant in its cradle, every corpse in its coffin, every woman in her home, every man toiling in the field, sweating at the anvil, or laboring at the forge. Shall we hesitate to remain here until we have destroyed this legislative fraud? Shall we go home and say: "We just got tired and concluded to quit"?

I am in favor of amending this bill by adding not only the steel, not only the sugar, not only the chemical, but the rubber schedule as well and all other schedules which afflict the American people; and sending them to the House of Representatives for its consideration.

I break no confidence when I say that it is the desire of the leaders of the other House that we shall do that thing. What will be wrought out there I do not know; but this I do know, that men, earnest in their purpose to relieve the American people, will try to bring out a result that we can justly enact into law.

So, I want to say in conclusion, that I join with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] in saying, we can not afford to vote down good measures because they may have been offered in a way we do not like. I say to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], who is my neighbor, and to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], whom I admire, and who has made many a brave fight on this floor, you can not afford, because you do not like the way a thing is done, to refuse to do your duty by the people. I am sure the Democrats will do theirs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEYBURN in the chair). The question is on the substitute offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] for the bill as amended.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I wish to state briefly that I shall support the House bill. In the event of its defeat, I shall support the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

I should deprecate seeing so many amendments put on this bill that it would lead to a loss of enough votes to prevent the passage of it. There is such a thing as loading down a bill until it will not float above water. I am willing to vote for proper reductions in any number that will receive a sufficient number of votes to be passed, but I think it is somewhat hazardous to put upon this cotton schedule, with the steel-schedule amendment, a series of schedules that may lose two or three votes here and there. For that reason I think it would be better not to load down the cotton schedule by too great a number of amendments. I desired to say that much before this vote was taken. I favor the amendments reducing the tariff on the steel schedule, sugar and rubber schedules, and will vote for them, but prefer supporting them as separate measures as to sugar and rubber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BACON. I understand this is a vote upon the substitute offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] for the bill as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A vote on the substitute.

Mr. BACON. For the entire bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For the entire bill as amended. It was so held by the previous occupant of the chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, do I understand by that that if the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin is carried the work in the Senate in adding the metal schedule to the cotton schedule would be undone?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say, if I may be permitted, Mr. President, that if the amendment which I have offered in the nature of a substitute shall be carried there will then be offered the metal schedule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the metal schedule has already been adopted as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; but I will offer it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why can not the Senator from Wisconsin offer his substitute to consist of the cotton schedule as he prepared it and the metal schedule, so that the fate of the metal schedule will not be involved in it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not think it will involve the fate of the metal schedule at all, Mr. President, if the course of procedure is taken which I anticipate will be taken and should my substitute amendment be adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It seems to me that we will have to do the metal-schedule work over again later.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I desire to announce that I am paired with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. CLAPP (when Mr. GRONNA's name was called). I desire to announce that the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is necessarily absent from the Senate. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. LODGE's name was called). I am requested to again announce that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

Mr. PERCY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], but I understand that, if present, he would vote "nay" on this proposition, and therefore I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CLAPP (when Mr. POINDEXTER's name was called). The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] is paired with the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON]. If the Senator from Washington were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when Mr. STONE's name was called). I desire to again announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], occasioned by sickness. If he were present, he would vote "nay." I desire to state further that he is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise simply to announce that my colleague [Mr. KENYON] is unavoidably absent from the city. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 51, as follows:

Borah	Brown	Cummins	La Follette

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments to be offered to the pending bill as in Committee of the Whole? If not, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On the passage of the bill I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). I had intended in Committee of the Whole to vote for this bill, but to protect a pair which has been intrusted to me, I will vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. LODGE's name was called). I wish to again announce that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

Mr. PERCY (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON] and the transfer of that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when Mr. STONE's name was called). I desire again to announce the necessary absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. TAYLOR (when his name was called). I desire to again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I inquire if the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] is recorded as having voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he is not so recorded.

Mr. WATSON. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that I am paired with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. NELSON. The senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. If the Senator from North Dakota were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Certain Senators who are present in the Chamber did not answer to their names when they were called. I refer the Chair to Rule XII, which provides:

1. When the yeas and nays are ordered, the names of Senators shall be called alphabetically; and each Senator shall, without debate, declare his assent or dissent to the question, unless excused by the Senate.

I read from paragraph 2 of the same rule:

2. When a Senator declines to vote on call of his name, he shall be required to assign his reasons therefor, and having assigned them, the Presiding Officer shall submit the question to the Senate: "Shall the Senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?" which shall be decided without debate.

I do not pretend to be well versed in the construction of the rules of the Senate or in parliamentary law, but it seems to me the portions of the rules I have read apply directly and immediately to the case now before the Senate. I know, and the Chair knows, that there are Senators sitting here at this moment in full view of the Chair and in full view of the Senate who, when their names were called, did not answer and did not vote. I believe they ought to be required to state their reasons for not voting, and then it ought to be submitted to the Senate whether those reasons are or are not sufficient to excuse them. I suggest that point of order, if it be a point of order, before the conclusion of the roll call is announced.

Mr. WATSON. I see that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] is present. I therefore feel at liberty to vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the name of the Senator from West Virginia.

The Secretary called Mr. WATSON's name, and he voted "yea."

Mr. OWEN. I ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to designate the Senators who are present and not voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the proper course to pursue is to call the names of all Senators who have not voted, and if the Chair's attention is called to the presence in the Chamber of a Senator whose name is called, the Chair will then request that Senator to vote——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Mississippi permit the Chair to finish his announcement? Or some Senator may make a motion, which would be in order, that the Senator be excused from voting.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it in order to make a motion to excuse from voting all Senators who did not vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it would be, although that is a little out of the usual order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, if it be in order, I make the motion now that all Senators who did not vote be excused from voting.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CUMMINS. Under the rule no Senator——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa will finish his point of order.

Mr. CUMMINS. Under the rule no Senator can be excused from voting until he has stated in the presence of the Senate his reasons for not voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule is explicit. The second clause of Rule XII says that when required to vote, the individual Senator shall assign his reasons, and that thereafter the Senate shall determine whether or not the reasons are sufficient. That rule being specifically invoked, the Chair thinks the motion of the Senator from Mississippi could hardly be entertained and that the proper course is for the Secretary to call the names of such Senators as did not vote.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, this rule has never been invoked, so far as my experience goes in the Senate. I doubt whether there is a Member of this body who has not exercised his judgment as to whether he should vote or not on a measure.

As far as I am concerned, I did not vote, and I will state candidly that the reason why I did not was that I have concluded to leave this measure to the Democrats of this body and to the so-called insurgents to perfect it in any way they may desire.

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the name of the Senator from Pennsylvania is reached it will be for the Senate to determine whether the reasons the Senator has assigned are sufficient to excuse him from voting.

Mr. PENROSE. I shall ask the Senate to sustain me in those reasons when my name is called.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is unavoidably absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the names of such Senators as did not answer to the roll call.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. BRADLEY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not see the Senator from Kentucky in the Chamber.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. BRANDEGEE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not see the Senator from Connecticut in the Chamber.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. BRIGGS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not see the Senator from New Jersey in the Chamber.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from New Jersey, whose name has just been called, was in the Chamber a moment ago, when the discussion as to whether Senators should be excused from voting or not arose. I think he has doubtless——

Mr. PENROSE. He was called out, I think.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Retired to the cloak room.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He is not in the Chamber. The Secretary will continue the roll call.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would suggest that a messenger be sent to ask him to return to the Chamber and to meet his obligations here upon this important question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair knows of no rule by which that can be accomplished.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That would be simply unheard of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say that I did not recall a rule under which that suggestion could be carried out, but I thought it pertinent to make the suggestion and let it go upon the record.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have said what I wanted to say. I regard that as unheard of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the roll call of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. BRYAN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not see the Senator from Florida in the Chamber.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. CLARK of Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. As heretofore announced by me, I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the Senator from Wyoming, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting? [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it, and the Senator from Wyoming is excused from voting.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. CRANE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts is absent from the Chamber.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. CURTIS.

Mr. CURTIS. I announced, not when my name was called, but after the calling of the roll had been concluded, that I am paired with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. If he were present, I would vote "nay." I made that announcement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For the reasons assigned by the Senator from Kansas, shall he be excused from voting? [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it, and the Senator from Kansas is excused from voting.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. DAVIS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas is absent from the Chamber.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. DU PONT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is absent from the Chamber.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. GALLINGER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire is absent from the Chamber.

Mr. BURNHAM. I wish to state that my colleague is necessarily absent, and is paired.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The absence of the Senator from New Hampshire from the city is well known to the Senate.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. GORE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma is absent from the Chamber.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. GRONNA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is well known that the Senator from North Dakota is absent from the city.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. GUGGENHEIM.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I desire to say that when the point of order was made by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] immediately left the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That relieves the Chair from announcing his absence from the Chamber. The Secretary will continue the call.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. HITCHCOCK.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska is absent from the Chamber.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. KENYON.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa is absent from the city.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. LODGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts has been absent from the Chamber all day.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. LORIMER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not see the Senator from Illinois in the Chamber.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. MCCUMBER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota is absent from the city.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. MCLEAN.

Mr. MCLEAN. I announced earlier in the day that I have a pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and I requested that that announcement should stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For the reason assigned, shall the Senator from Connecticut be excused from voting? [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it, and the Senator from Connecticut is excused from voting.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. NIXON.

Mr. NIXON. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

The VICE PRESIDENT. For the reason assigned by the Senator from Nevada, shall he be excused from voting? [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it, and the Senator from Nevada is excused from voting.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. O'GORMAN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York is absent from the city.

Mr. ROOT. I should like to make a part of the record of this particular proceeding the statement of fact that my colleague [Mr. O'GORMAN] and the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] are paired.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I was here when the roll was called, and I did not answer to my name. I did so advisedly. I had been led to believe—and I think I am right—that if this bill should be defeated by a vote, the same course would be pursued with regard to it that was pursued a few weeks ago with respect to another important measure relating to the tariff—that is, a motion to reconsider would be entered and an endeavor would be made to reframe it.

I do not propose by any affirmative action to be a party to any such proceeding. I think I have a right not to vote upon this bill, and I ask the Senate to excuse me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For the reasons assigned by the Senator from Pennsylvania shall he be excused from voting?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa will state it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is the question debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask for the yeas and nays——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point of order——

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon the question of excusing the Senator from Pennsylvania from voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa asks for the yeas and nays upon the question whether the Senator from Pennsylvania shall be excused from voting.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on the question, Shall the Senator from Pennsylvania for the reasons assigned by him be excused from voting?

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when Mr. BRYAN's name was called). As I before announced to-day, my colleague [Mr. BRYAN] is necessarily absent from the city, but in order that the record may be right on this proceeding, I repeat the statement that by a transfer he is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I announced the pair earlier in the day, but owing to the fact that I was in the Chamber when the previous vote was taken, I desire to announce it again, and I withhold my vote for that reason.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. NIXON (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I presume I can be excused from voting on this question.

Mr. PERCY (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer the pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TAYLOR (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY].

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). My pair is apparently absent from the Chamber. I therefore withhold my vote. I should like very much to excuse all Republicans from voting on all occasions.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—36.

Bacon	Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Root
Bankhead	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Bourne	Foster	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Burnham	Gamble	Nelson	Swanson
Burton	Heyburn	Newlands	Thornton
Chilton	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Townsend
Clarke, Ark.	Johnston, Ala.	Paynter	Warren
Culberson	Jones	Penrose	Wetmore
Cullom	Lippitt	Perkins	Williams

NAYS—15.

Borah	Clapp	Kern	Pomerene
Bristow	Crawford	La Follette	Reed
Brown	Cummins	Lea	Shively
Chamberlain	Dixon	Page

NOT VOTING—38.

Bailey	Gallinger	Nixon	Smoot
Bradley	Gore	O'Gorman	Stephenson
Brandegee	Gronna	Oliver	Stone
Briggs	Guggenheim	Owen	Sutherland
Bryan	Hitchcock	Percy	Taylor
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Poindexter	Tillman
Crane	Lodge	Rayner	Watson
Curtis	Lorimer	Richardson	Works
Davis	McCumber	Smith, Md.
du Pont	McLean	Smith, Mich.

So Mr. OLIVER was excused from voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the next name.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. PENROSE.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I withheld my vote because I have no interest in the pending legislation other than to hasten action upon it so that Congress may be enabled to adjourn at as early a date as possible and relieve the business interests of the country of the disturbance created by our continuance in session here.

I am opposed to all the tariff measures and amendments now pending or heretofore acted upon, and not belonging to the majority which in the last few weeks has had control of the tariff legislation in the Senate, I thought it logical and consistent to leave the perfection of the details of the measure to the majority of those Senators who have been in full control of tariff legislation.

Therefore, not being able to cast an intelligent vote at all, I withheld my vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the Senator from Pennsylvania for the reasons assigned by him be excused from voting?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin asks for the yeas and nays. Is there a second? [After counting.] Ten Senators have seconded the demand—not a sufficient number. The yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Some hands on this side were raised after the count had been made. I observed that myself, and I ask for a recount.

Mr. OLIVER. I submit a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin challenging the count of the Chair, the Chair will again put the question.

Mr. OLIVER. I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator from Wisconsin did not rise when he addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained. Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays. [After counting.] Not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

The question is, Shall the Senator from Pennsylvania for the reasons assigned by him be excused from voting? [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it, and the Senator from Pennsylvania is excused from voting. The Secretary will call the next name.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. PERCY.

Mr. PERCY. I have a pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], as announced when my name was called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the Senator from Mississippi, for the reason assigned by him be excused from voting? [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it, and the Senator from Mississippi is excused from voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri is sick at his residence.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. SUTHERLAND.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah is out of the city.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. TAYLOR. As I have announced, I am paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], who is sick in his room in the city.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the Senator from Tennessee for the reasons assigned by him be excused from voting? [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it, and the Senator from Tennessee is excused from voting.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. TILLMAN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina is out of the city.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. TOWNSEND, and he answered "nay."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan votes "nay."

The Secretary called the name of Mr. WORKS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not see the Senator from California in the Chamber.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, it should be stated, I think, in connection with this call——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us first dispose of the Senator from California.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California is not present, and there need be no motion. The Secretary will recapitulate the vote.

R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.

Mr. HEYBURN, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 139), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and is hereby, authorized to have printed such hearings or other matter as may be deemed necessary in connection with subjects to be considered by said committee during the Sixty-second Congress.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NEWARK, OHIO.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator withhold that motion for a moment?

Mr. PENROSE. I withhold the motion.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13276) to provide for the disposal of the present Federal building site at Newark, Ohio, and for the purchase of a new site for such building, to report it without amendment. I call the attention of the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to it.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT LYNCHBURG, VA.

Mr. SWANSON. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13391) to increase the cost limit of the public building at Lynchburg, Va., to report it without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 18, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 17, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, strengthen, we beseech Thee, our faith in the eternal verities, that we may not become completely absorbed in the things which are temporal, that we may have great thoughts and do noble deeds, and thus build for ourselves a character which shall stand the test of time and leave behind us a record worthy of all emulation, in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest a correction in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. On yesterday the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. LITTLEPAGE] asked and obtained leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. His remarks are extended in the RECORD and interlarded with the remarks 14 times occurs the word "applause," and once occurs the words "loud applause." The remarks were not delivered in the House.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the gentleman, and I want to know to what page the gentleman refers?

Mr. MANN. To page 4031.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. To LITTLEPAGE. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Illinois anything more to say?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the RECORD be corrected by striking out from this speech the word "applause" where it occurs 14 times and the words "loud applause" where they occur once.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a question, as I am not informed. Was the gentleman from West Virginia given leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. He was given leave by unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, from the number of times that extensions of remarks have been made, interlarded with addresses from people all over the world, I think the gentleman has the right to extend his remarks as far as he wanted to do so.

Mr. MANN. I do not think he has the right in extending his remarks to insert actions of the House which did not take place.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any motion to make touching the RECORD?

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that it be corrected.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I object.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the RECORD be corrected by striking out the words "applause" and "loud applause" where occurring in the speech of Mr. LITTLEPAGE on pages 4031, 4032, and 4033 of the RECORD.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to refer the matter to the appropriate committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to refer the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the whole matter to the Committee on Printing. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 143, noes 71.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 171, nays 122, answered "present" 13, not voting 79, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 6, and agree to the same.
On the amendments of the Senate numbered 5 and 7 and the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

On amendment No. 1: Places binders on the free list, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments Nos. 3, 4, and 6: Makes verbal corrections in the text of the bill.
On the amendments of the Senate Nos. 5 and 7 and the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 8 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

O. W. UNDERWOOD,
C. B. RANDELL,
FRANCIS BURTON HARRISON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the House conferees agreed to the conference report. It leaves in disagreement three amendments of the Senate and one amendment of the House. I would like to arrange a division of time with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from New York that we confine debate on this proposition to an hour, and that he control half of it and that I control the other half.
Mr. PAYNE. I am agreeable to that.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, there are four motions I desire to make, but I desire to ask unanimous consent to make them all now, so that they will be pending before the House.
The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama what is the agreement with the gentleman from New York?
Mr. UNDERWOOD. That there shall be one hour's debate on the free-list bill, the gentleman from New York to control half the time and myself half the time.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the debate on the conference report on this bill be limited to one hour, and that he control the first half of it and that the gentleman from New York control the other half. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
The SPEAKER. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Alabama what is his other motion?
Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask unanimous consent to make at once the four motions that I desire to make in connection with this bill, in order to have them all pending at once.
Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman desire a separate vote on lemons?
Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; on each proposition.
Mr. MANN. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman that it does not need unanimous consent to give notice of the amendments he will offer. They will be in order regardless of unanimous consent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No doubt that is true, but I prefer to have the House determine.

Mr. MANN. What are they?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman what I propose to move. I propose to move to concur in Senate amendment No. 5, with an amendment striking out the word "corn," as it appears in line 11 of page 3 of the printed copy of the bill—I have not the original—and to concur in Senate amendment No. 7.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, does the gentleman propose to move to strike out "corn" and to insert "for purposes of distillation" after "corn"?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will move to strike it out. The result is the same whichever method is followed. It is easier and less complicated to strike it out. I propose then to move to concur in Senate amendment No. 7, with an amendment striking out the word "corn" where it appears in line 19 of page 3 of the printed bill—wherever it appears correctly in the regular bill.

Mr. MANN. That is, the word "corn," with an amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes. Then I propose to recede from the House amendment No. 1, inserting "lemons"; and then I propose to move to concur in Senate amendment No. 8, in reference to Roman and Portland cement.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not need unanimous consent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that.

Mr. MANN. Certain motions are in order, and the notice covers them.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Alabama withdraws his request for unanimous consent?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I prefer to ask unanimous consent that I may have the privilege, because when the hour is up there may be some question about my rights——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that, in addition to this amendment that he is offering now, when this hour of debate expires he shall have the right to offer three other amendments.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to make this suggestion and to obtain this parliamentary information if I can. The time for debate has been limited to one hour, and the previous question has not been ordered at the end of the hour. It will still be permissible to offer motions at the end of the hour. The gentleman from Alabama can offer his motions. On the other hand, if anyone on this side or that side desires to offer a motion to concur in the Senate amendments, it will be in order. I do not think the gentleman ought to take away any rights that any other gentleman may have. I ask for parliamentary information whether the agreement to close debate at the end of the hour in itself operates to prevent motions being made at the end of the hour?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think that it does not.

Mr. MANN. There is not any question about it.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Illinois objecting to this unanimous consent or not?

Mr. MANN. I will object, if the gentleman makes the request. I do not wish to cut the gentleman off from the opportunity to make his motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair states that unless the gentleman from Alabama moves the previous question at the end of this hour anybody who can get the floor can move——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I intend to move the previous question, and I intended to allow the gentlemen on that side to offer——

Mr. MANN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that a motion for the previous question would not prevent a motion of priority, which is the motion to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And I have no desire to do so.

Mr. MANN. I understand that. It is not necessary to move the previous question. The debate is limited, and closes at the end of the hour.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Illinois objecting?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will endeavor to put the bill through, notwithstanding the objections of the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in Senate amendment No. 5, with an amendment striking out the word "corn," where it appears in line 11, page 3, of the printed bill, and the corresponding place in the enrolled bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the House concur in Senate amendment No. 5, with an amendment striking out the word "corn," in line 11, page 3, of the printed bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make this statement to the House. We passed a free-list bill, putting on the free list—

Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, fresh, salted, pickled, dried, smoked, dressed or undressed, prepared or preserved in any manner, bacon, hams, shoulders, lard, lard compound and lard substitutes, and sausage and sausage meats.

We also placed on the free list—

Buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, rye flour, bran, middlings, and other offals of grain, oatmeal and rolled oats, and all prepared cereal foods, and biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened.

The House was in favor of that proposition. I believe to-day that the House—I know that the Democratic side of the House—is in favor of free meats and free bread for the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When the bill went to the Senate the Senate added the following provision, both to the provision in the House bill relating to free meats and the provision relating to free bread. Their amendment was:

Insert after all words about these articles on the free list the following: "Coming from any foreign country with which the United States has a reciprocal agreement and which shall admit from the United States free of duty cotton, corn, wheat, oats, horses, cattle, and hogs."

Now, Mr. Speaker, when this bill went to conference the conferees on the part of the House refused to agree to that Senate amendment, and stated that they insisted that the Senate should have another vote on the question of giving the American people free bread and free meat. We came to a partial agreement about minor amendments, but on these two important amendments we refused to agree and insisted that the bill should go back to the Senate for another vote. It went back to the Senate, and the Senate still insisted on its amendments and sent the bill back to the House with these amendments that prohibit meat and bread coming from any country in the world.

I understand, though, that the Senate is willing to pass the bill prohibiting meat and bread coming free from any country in the world except Canada; they are willing to pass the bill giving free bread and free meat from the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. For a question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman say that it is his understanding that the so-called Kern amendment was for the purpose of preventing the introduction of meat and bread from any country?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not say that that was the purpose. My friend misunderstood me.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman think that that was the intention, or was it a mistake?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was undoubtedly a mistake. The Kern amendment, by inserting the word "corn" in this amendment, prohibited bread and meat coming from Canada or any other country, because, under the reciprocal trade agreement, there is a tax on corn for distilling purposes going from this country into Canada. Therefore, if you pass the bill as it now reads without striking out the word "corn," you would not admit bread and meat free from any country. But if you strike out the word "corn," as I propose to do in my amendment, then you will prohibit free bread and meat coming from all other countries, but you will admit free bread and free meat from Canada. I understand that the Senate is willing to agree to that amendment and admit free bread and free meat from Canada.

But if we insist on free bread and free meat from the balance of the world it means that the bill will be defeated.

Now, there is no man in this House that is more anxious to have free bread and free meat from all the world than I am, because I believe that if there is anything that ought to go on the free list it is bread and meat for the people of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There is no clause in this bill that is of more interest to my own constituency than this question of free bread and free meat. But I recognize the fact that we have got to surrender free bread and free meat or defeat this bill, and the propriety of surrendering rather than to deprive the people of the United States of the other great benefits they will receive under the enactment of this bill into law. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We will give to the country free agricultural implements, we will give them free shoes, we will give them many other desirable things; and although I know that the Members on this side of the House desire to give the country free bread and free meat, I say the time has come when we are compelled to surrender as to these amendments in order that we may send to the President a meritorious bill.

Now, in reference to the Senate amendment putting Portland cement on the free list, so far as I know there has been no opposition from this side of the House and but very little from the other side.

As to lemons, put on by the House amendment, we refused to come to an agreement on free lemons. The Senate disagreed to our amendment. We insisted that they should take it back to the Senate for another vote. They did take it back, and the Senate defeated the amendment. Now, I say there is no more outrageous provision in the Payne tariff bill than the increased tax that they put on lemons.

They had a prohibitive duty on oranges, and have driven every foreign orange out of this country. The increased tax there was a fair tax, a high tax, at least a tax that was too high for the consumer, but gave all the protection to the lemon grower of California that he had a right to ask for in the Dingley bill, and the Payne bill increased it one-half. The result is going to be that if this tax on lemons stays on the statute books for a year or two longer, exactly the same thing is going to happen in reference to lemons that happened in reference to oranges. It is going to drive the Sicilian and the Italian lemon out of the American market, and the people of this country, and the hospitals, and the eleemosynary institutions that require lemons at the sick bed are going to be placed in the hands of one of the most drastic trusts that exists in the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] So far as I am concerned, I would like to keep free lemons in this bill. I hope the day is not far distant when we can again legislate in reference to the tax on lemons and do justice to the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But I realize that if the House stands out now for its amendment for free lemons on this bill the bill is defeated, and I think it is wise for us to surrender and take what we can get and remedy these other evils when we can get to them in a no distant day, as I am sure we will have the opportunity to do.

Mr. Speaker, after the debate on this proposition is over, I will make my motion in reference to the other amendment. I now reserve the balance of my time and ask the Chair to tell me how much time I have consumed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAGE). The gentleman from Alabama has consumed 12 minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state what, in my judgment, will be the effect of this amendment. Two years ago the Payne tariff bill reduced the tariff on meats about 25 per cent. That was a Republican reduction, made by a Republican Congress—Republican in both branches—and by a Republican Ways and Means Committee; substantially an average reduction of 25 per cent on meats straight through. I wanted meats free then, and I am for free meat now. Shortly after that the Canadian reciprocity negotiations were begun by the President, and a Republican administration endeavored by its negotiations to have free meat between the United States and Canada. They did not succeed in it because Canada objected, but the Republican administration did succeed in reducing under the reciprocity treaty the duty on meats between these two countries by 16⅔ per cent. That makes a reduction of 41 per cent on meats during this Republican administration, and nothing by the Democratic Members of this Congress, now in practical control of both branches of it. Now, then, what came next? The reciprocity agreement was concluded, and there were those who honestly believed that they could not eat cattle, but must eat meat; that they could not eat wheat, but must eat flour; and so the Democratic Party brought in this free-list bill providing for free meat and free flour from all the world. Then the Republicans tried to secure a market for our farmers by insisting on reciprocal treatment of this product with other countries, and the Democrats refused even that. The bill passed this House and went to the Senate, and an amendment was put on there by a Democrat and voted for by every Democrat in the Senate, making meat dutiable at the Payne rate from all the world. That is the situation. Not a dollar of reduction on meats has been made by anybody except the Republican Party. An indorsement and approval of the Payne rates has been given by every Democrat in the Senate, and now every Democrat on the floor of this House proposes to supplement that indorsement. That is the situation exactly as it is. I propose to ask permission to insert as a part of my remarks an extract from the New York World of August 18, 1911, giving the prices of meats this year and last year.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to insert an extract in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

Mr. HILL. Oh, it is Democratic authority, and you surely will not object to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I did not rise to object, but I would like to ask the question, If my friend disputes for a moment that every Democrat on the Ways and Means Committee during the consideration of the Payne bill was in favor of free meat?

Mr. HILL. Oh, the people of the United States look at the results and not at individual explanations. I am giving a statement of conditions exactly as they are, and when the gentleman from Colorado——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman put it on, and he voted for a rule to prevent us from amending it and cutting it off.

Mr. HILL. Very well. When the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER], a Democrat, the other day took the floor on this conference report, I said to him, "Does not this amendment put the Democratic Party squarely in the position of being in favor of the Payne rate of duty on meats as it is now contained in the Payne bill?" and he replied that it did. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], said last night, and he repeats it now, that he is compelled to recede and concur with the Senate on this question, in order to save the rest of the bill. So that the Democratic Party not only deliberately continues in effect a duty on meat by its vote in both Houses, but it gives us the terms and conditions under which they do it. Now, what are they?

What is the rest of this bill? First, free agricultural implements. We have them now free from every export country in the world except Germany, and we can have them from Germany if they will admit ours. What is the next item—this is no gift, it is a trade—what is the next item? We swap free bread for free barbed wire. The men in the Scriptures who asked for bread and were given a stone had a royal feast compared to the American people who, under Democratic legislation, are offered taxed food in exchange for free barbed wire. [Applause on the Republican side.] We swap free meat, for what? Free cotton ties. An industry of $700,000,000, averaging 20 per cent duty now, and you absolutely and deliberately say you are willing to sacrifice cheaper food for the wage earners and consumers of this country in exchange for free cotton ties for the southern cotton grower.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Connecticut knows that is not true——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman will give me more time, I will yield to him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the gentleman makes a statement that is not true.

Mr. HILL. Then the gentleman can correct it in his own time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We have not made any swaps.

Mr. HILL. Fresh meats, ham, bacon, flour, the food of the people—$1,500,000,000 of it—and a month ago these men came in their holy purity and said they were going to give to the wage earners of New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, New Orleans—the men who work in the factories and shops—that they were going to give them free food, and you swap it off now for bagging for cotton and save $600,000 to the million growers of cotton, and, as you have admitted in your free-list report would be the effect, you lose more than $100,000,000 to 90,000,000 consumers in this country. That is your swap. That is the trade you are making now with your Democratic brethren in the Senate.

Why do you not stand up to your claim of a month ago and have free meat and free flour? If you can not get it in any other way than by losing this bill, sacrifice your cotton growers, sacrifice your cotton ties, sacrifice your cotton bagging, sacrifice your barbed wire. They are insignificant compared with the needs the poor people——

Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

Mr. HILL. I will yield to the gentleman because I know he is in favor of free meat for his own people.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman was in favor of free meats when the Payne bill was under consideration, was he not?

Mr. HILL. I said I did try to get free meats; we did get a reduction of 25 per cent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why did not the gentleman make a sacrifice of the New England manufacturers when he could not get free meats? [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I hope that will not be taken out of my time; it is so very seldom I am applauded by my enemies I want them to have full scope. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman asked me a question. I did not stand on this floor preaching one doctrine to the House of Representatives and another to my constituents at home in a campaign. [Applause on the Republican side.] I stand for a moderate tariff that will absolutely recognize the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. [Cries of "Oh!" on the Democratic side.] Absolutely.

Mr. GARNER. Does that apply to meat?

Mr. HILL. It applies to everything.

Mr. GARNER. Then, why did you want to put meats on the free list?

Mr. HILL. Because we can produce and do, and export from one hundred and seventy-five to two hundred million dollars' worth every year, raised cheaper here than in any other country on earth.

Mr. GARNER. Then, the tariff does not make any difference——

Mr. HILL. It is immaterial whether it makes any difference or not, I stand on the principle; you do not. You trade a principle for cotton ties, cotton bagging, and barbed wire and sacrifice the people of this country to your own interests to make a little larger profits in the cotton-growing industry. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The statement is as follows:

RETAILERS WILL BOOST ALL MEAT PRICES TO-MORROW—ADVANCE BY WHOLESALERS OF FROM 3 TO 5 CENTS A POUND FORCES THEM TO ASK MORE—PACKERS PLEAD THERE'S A SCARCITY OF CATTLE—CHICAGO REPORTS DON'T SHOW THIS TO BE TRUE—POTATOES GETTING DEARER.

New York housekeepers may look for higher prices for almost every kind of meat to-morrow. In the face of an advance in the wholesale prices for beef and pork of from 3 to 5 cents a pound, many of the retail dealers have been able to keep their prices down because they had laid in large stocks of meat at the lower figures.

Interviews with many large retail dealers by a reporter for the World yesterday showed, however, that the breaking point has come, and that retail dealers generally will be obliged to advance prices to-morrow. In pork of the first quality dealers who have been keeping the retail price at from 18½ cents to 20 will be forced to demand 25 cents, which is said to be a record price.

TWO CENTS MORE FOR PORTERHOUSE.

Porterhouse steaks that some dealers have been able to keep at 28 cents during the week will jump to 30 and 31 cents. Hams are already held at 24 cents retail, as against 20 cents two weeks ago, and must go higher in view of the advanced wholesale price.

Wholesale prices can be quoted with some accuracy, although there are many sides to the dealing in meats that make this almost impossible. To give retail prices in an understandable manner it is always necessary to obtain comparative figures of dealers in the same neighborhood at different times.

Dr. Ira S. Wile and Miss Winifred Gibbs, who made an exhaustive study of food conditions last year, found that four classes furnished the smallest number into which they could divide retail prices of meats that are called by the same name. At the present time a comparison of prices between some west side stores one year ago and between some east side stores to-day might seemingly show a falling off in price.

On the other hand, a comparison between prices of some east side dealers one year ago and the present prices of some west side dealers might show such an increase in price as to frighten the public. By taking the reports of the books of the same dealers in different localities it was shown yesterday that prices for meats are generally 1 or 2 cents above the average high level last year when the entire country was stirred by the high prices.

PREDICTS VERY HIGHEST PRICES.

In view of the fact that many retail butchers have been holding back on raising prices, one Fourth Avenue butcher stated yesterday he believed the coming week would see the highest prices ever recorded for meats.

An official of Swift & Co. reiterated yesterday the statement of the packers that there is a scarcity of cattle. Reports from Chicago do not show such a scarcity. Receipts of cattle for last week were 59,081, and for the week before 60,351, as against receipts of 50,184 for the first week in August, 1910, and 59,110 for the second week.

In connection with the increased prices of meats, the jump in the price of potatoes is said by many dealers to be likely to be most seriously felt here. Again prices vary according to locality, but Arthur Liess, of No. 3407 Broadway, gives the following comparison in the retail prices:

7 CENTS MORE THAN LAST YEAR.

"Last year at this time potatoes were selling at 18 cents for a basket of 2½ pounds. The price dropped to 17 cents, but is now 25 cents a basket, with every prospect of going higher."

Several of the butchers interviewed said new high prices would be forced by the fact that for the last 18 months or more they have been receiving 4 cents a pound for fat. This enabled the butchers to trim their meats carefully and sell at a low price. Now the packers have dropped their price for fat to 2 cents, with the result that on a trimmed steak or roast the butcher must charge 2 cents a pound more or be less careful in the trimming.

COMPARATIVE RETAIL PRICES IN ONE BUTCHER SHOP IN THE LAST YEAR.

To give retail prices that will show any comparison of figures with accuracy, the same dealers in the same localities must be quoted. To compare prices in some east-side shops one year ago with prices in some west-side shops to-day would give no idea of conditions. In the following table the World uses the retail figures of M. Utter, a meat dealer in upper Broadway. He has neither multimillionaires nor very poor for his customers. All figures are for first-class meats:

	1910		1911
	Aug. 12.	Nov. 1.	Feb. 1.	Aug. 11.
Porterhouse steak	$0.26	$0.27	$0.23	$0.23
Sirloin	.22	.23	.20	.24
Prime beef, including bone	.21	.22	.20	.22
Round	.21	.22	.20	.22
Lamb chops	.27	.28	.25	.28
Pork chops	.20	.22	.18	.25
Hams	.20	.23	.19	.24

Market conditions to-morrow are expected to result in increased prices at retail. The profit on several lines is at present 2 cents a pound less than formerly.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, the attempt of the leader of the Democratic majority [Mr. UNDERWOOD], backed up by the solid vote of the other side of the House, to place lemons upon the free list, without any hearing or warning whatever, is, in my opinion, one of the most remarkable and unjustifiable movements in the history of tariff legislation.

What is the history of this attempt to subject the lemon industry of this country to the penalty of absolute free trade?

The bill now under consideration, and which is a measure to place certain articles upon the free list, was christened by its authors for political purposes "The farmers' free-list bill," and was declared by its sponsors to be a bill primarily for the purpose of reducing the prices of certain articles which the farmers of the country are supposed to buy. Lemons being an agricultural product, of course, that product could not logically be included in such a bill. However, when the bill was on its passage through this House two amendments were offered to the bill designed to place lemons on the free list. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], leader of the majority, recognizing that such an amendment was illogical, himself interposed points of order against each amendment to the effect that such an amendment was not germane to the bill, and the Chair promptly ruled that the point of order was well taken, and that such amendments could not be offered to the bill.

When this bill went to the Senate and was under consideration in that body, an amendment putting lemons upon the free list, and incorporating it in the bill, upon an actual vote was rejected by that body, not upon the merits, I regret to say, but because at that point in the consideration of the bill nearly all Democratic Senators desired to pass the bill without amendment, and a large majority of Republican Senators were against the bill in any form.

The two attempts in the House and the one attempt in the Senate upon this bill to subject the lemon industry to the penalty of free trade having failed and the Democratic majority having announced to the country that no attempt would be made to consider the agricultural schedule of the tariff until next session of Congress, the action of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in endeavoring to remove all duties from imported lemons is remarkable indeed. What next followed, Mr. Speaker? The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] a few days ago, when he made the formal motion to send the free-list bill to conference, included in that motion a motion to concur in the Senate amendment putting cement and lime upon the free list by adding the words "and lemons." This was a remarkable action on the part of the chairman of the great Committee on Ways and Means of this House, and, in my opinion, considering all the circumstances, his action is unprecedented. After both Houses had refused to include lemons in the bill in question the action of the gentleman from Alabama, in making the mere formal motion to send the bill to conference, to include in such motion a motion to concur in a Senate amendment by adding the words "and lemons," when the gentleman himself in the prior consideration of the bill had taken the position that such a motion was out of order, is truly remarkable. And this motion was made at a time when I was ill and sick in bed and had been excused on that account from attendance upon the House. It would seem that fair treatment would require that the Representative upon the Ways and Means Committee from the State most interested should at least have had some intimation or notice that such an important motion would be included in the mere formal procedure of putting the bill in conference. But I must assume that the gentlemen upon the other side in their efforts at tariff smashing do not consider it of any importance that an industry which is about to be subjected to the penalty of absolute free trade should have any notice whatever that such action is contemplated. This attempted action of the Democratic majority in this House furnishes a good example of the consideration given tariff legislation during this session by the Democratic side.

The motion now pending, submitted by the gentleman from Alabama to recede from the House amendment to the Senate amendment, placing lemons on the free list and to concur in the Senate amendment, I thoroughly appreciate will relieve the lemon industry so far as this bill is concerned from the attempt to subject it to free trade. I am therefore in sympathy with the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama and shall support it. I appreciate, however, that this is a mere temporary respite from the agitation which our friends on the other side of the aisle have started in favor of reckless tariff revision. I thoroughly understand that this effort inaugurated by the Democratic Party will be renewed, and I thank the gentleman from Alabama for the timely notice which he has given us of his intention in this regard.

I desire to incorporate in my remarks at this point the language of the gentleman from Alabama in this respect. The reporter's notes show that the gentleman said:

As to lemons, put on by the House amendment, we refused to come to an agreement on free lemons. The Senate disagreed to our amendment. We insisted that they should take it back to the Senate for another vote. They did take it back, and the Senate defeated the amendment. Now, I say there is no more outrageous provision in the Payne tariff bill than the increased tax that they put on lemons.

They had a prohibitive duty on oranges, and have driven every foreign orange out of this country. The increased tax there was a fair tax, a high tax, at least a tax that was too high for the consumer, but gave all the protection to the lemon grower of California that he had a right to ask for in the Dingley bill, and the Payne bill increased it one-half. The result is going to be that if this tax on lemons stays on the statute books for a year or two longer exactly the same thing is going to happen in reference to lemons that happened in reference to oranges. It is going to drive the Sicilian and the Italian lemon out of the American market, and the people of this country and the hospitals and the eleemosynary institutions that require lemons at the sick bed are going to be placed in the hands of one of the most drastic trusts that exist in the United States. So far as I am concerned, I would like to keep free lemons in this bill. I hope the day is not far distant when we can again legislate in reference to the tax on lemons and do justice to the American people. But I realize that if the House stands out now for its amendment for free lemons on this bill the bill will be defeated, and I think it is wise for us to surrender and take what we can get and remedy these other evils when we can get to them in a not distant day, as I am sure we will have the opportunity to do.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the frank statement of the leader of the Democratic majority just made to this House. I am glad he has stated in effect what is his purpose, as it will put the growers of citrus fruits in California upon notice. I take it that his statement means that he proposes, if possible, not only to place lemons upon the free list but also to materially reduce the duty on oranges, and then I suppose it is his purpose and desire to reduce the rates on other products of California. For many campaigns I have been telling the people of California that if the Democratic Party had complete control of the two Houses of Congress and of the Presidency not a single industry of that State would escape the destructive tariff legislation of the Democratic Party. I have repeated this warning so often that many protectionists in our State began to believe that it was not made in good faith and that it was an exaggeration upon my part designed to advance my reelection to this body. Democratic candidates for Congress in California have for years denied that any industry of California need be afraid of a Democratic Congress and a Democratic President. Every Democratic candidate for Congress in California since I have been in politics has declared again and again that, in the event of the election of a Democratic administration in the executive and legislative branches of the Government the growers in California of citrus fruits, raisins, grapes, olives, nuts, wine, figs, prunes, and other products of the soil need have no fear. If the action of the Democratic majority in its attempt to subject the lemon industry to the penalty of absolute free trade without notice or hearing and the announced determination of the leader upon that side to continue this effort shall serve to awaken the people of California to the true situation, his action in this regard will not have been without benefit.

I appreciate that the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, now pending, will carry, and that the lemon growers of California will continue to receive, at least until the next session of Congress, the same protection which they now have in the Payne bill. I thoroughly appreciate, however, that if the proposition to place lemons upon the free list was submitted to either body of Congress at this session as a separate proposition, freed from political combinations and promises, that it would undoubtedly carry in both Houses of Congress, and that only the presidential veto at this time could save the industry from being utterly destroyed. The combination now in control in the Senate, made for ulterior purposes only, may for the time being, in order to carry out certain promises, be unwilling to subject the lemon industry to the extreme penalty of free trade. Still, however, that combination, in my opinion, is merely temporary, is a mere rope of sand, liable to separate at any moment. I fear that when that temporary understanding shall be at an end in the Senate and the obligations and promises now existing discharged, if the membership of that body were permitted to vote their true sentiments, freed from all obligations and promises, that the lemon industry would be subjected to free trade by practically a solid Democratic vote, augmented by enough Republican Senators to bring about that result. I say this because I do not wish the industry to rest in any fancied security that the present Senate situation promises any permanent protection. I am grateful and I feel that the industry should be thankful even for the temporary cause which postpones, even if it does not prevent, destruction and gives an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. Speaker, I confidently believe that if the lemon growers of California were given an opportunity to be heard, or if that industry were investigated by the Tariff Board, the following results would be shown:

First. That since the present duty of 1½ cents a pound upon lemons was imposed by the Payne law the importations of lemons into this country have actually increased. The records show that there were imported for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, which was the last fiscal year under the Dingley law, 135,183,550 pounds of lemons. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, when the duty was 1½ cents, as provided in the Payne law, there were imported 160,214,785 pounds, or an increase of approximately 25,000,000 pounds. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, there were imported 134,968,924 pounds. This was an apparent decrease in importations of 214,626 pounds, or 2,940 boxes, as compared with the last fiscal year of the Dingley bill. But actual importations have not decreased. The weekly publication of the New York Fruit Exchange, under date of August 4, 1911, shows importations of foreign lemons as follows:

	Boxes.
Month of July 1910	265,000
Month of July, 1911	387,525

This is an increase in July, 1911, over July, 1910, of 122,525 boxes, or approximately 9,000,000 pounds, for the month of July only. Do not these figures show that the importers of foreign lemons deliberately, with a view of causing the receipts for the year ending June 30, 1911, to show a decrease, held back importations until the first few days of July, 1911? The abnormal increase of approximately 9,000,000 pounds in the importation of foreign lemons during the month of July, 1911, as compared with the same month in 1910, can lead to no other conclusion than that importations were deliberately held back and that cargoes were not permitted to be landed until after July 1, so that this decrease could be shown for the fiscal year just mentioned.

The statement, therefore, of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], a member of the Ways and Means Committee, when the original motion was submitted by the gentleman from Alabama to place lemons upon the free list, that the importation of lemons had decreased is found by actual figures and statistics to be absolutely without foundation.

Second. It can be shown that there has been a large increase in the revenue which the Government has collected from imported lemons under the Payne law as compared with that collected under the Dingley law. It is hardly necessary to more than state this proposition, because the mere statement of it carries its own proof. The amount of revenue collected upon imported lemons for the year ending June 30, 1911, was $2,024,533.86, while the amount of revenue collected for the last fiscal year of the Dingley law was $1,351,835.50, an increase in one year in favor of the Treasury of the United States of the sum of $672,698.36. The amount collected the first year under the Payne law was much larger. From the standpoint of revenue, therefore, the present rate is entirely justified, and the attempt to put this article upon the free list when it has proven such an excellent producer of revenue is inexplicable to me.

Third. An impartial investigation will show, and the lemon growers of California, if given an opportunity, can show, in my judgment, that the prices of lemons to the consumers since the Payne law has been in effect have actually decreased, all statements to the contrary notwithstanding. Mr. W. L. Moulton, representative of the Citrus Fruit Growers of California in New York City, furnishes me with the following table, which can easily be confirmed upon investigation, giving the prices of Sicilian lemons in New York City during the week ending

August 5, 1911, and corresponding weeks in 1908 and 1907. Please remember that all sales of lemons in New York City are made at public auction:

	Week ending Aug. 5, 1911.	Week ending Aug. 5, 1908.	Week ending Aug. 5, 1907.
First choice, 300	$2.50 to $4.63	$3.85 to $4.50	$3.38 to $4.75
Second choice, 300	2.00 to 3.50	3.15 to 3.95	2.63 to 4.25
First choice, 360	2.50 to 4.00	3.10 to 3.65	3.63 to 4.75
Second choice, 360	2.00 to 3.00	2.70 to 3.25	2.72 to 4.25
Small sizes	1.75 to 3.25	2.52 to 2.75	2.25 to 3.50

These figures show that prices of lemons have been lower than they were before the passage of the Payne Act.

In addition to the foregoing, I have priced lemons in the markets and upon the streets in Washington very frequently, both before and after the passage of the Payne law, and I assert without fear of successful contradiction that they have been cheaper since that law went into effect than they were before. This very morning, on my way to the Capitol, I priced lemons and found them selling on the streets for 8, 10, and 12 cents a dozen, and in the markets the best lemons were to be obtained for 15, and none above 20 cents per dozen.

Fourth. It can be shown that large investments have been made upon the strength of the increased duty, there having been an additional acreage of lemons planted of approximately 30 per cent since the passage of the Payne law. These investments have been made upon the strength of the increased duty, and would be entirely sacrificed or destroyed if the duty were removed. In this connection I assert that there is ample territory in the State of California suitable for the growing of lemons that will make it possible, with the protection given by the Payne law, to lead within a comparatively short time to the production of sufficient lemons to supply the American market, a result greatly to be desired for reasons which I hope to enlarge upon further on in my speech.

Fifth. It can be shown, in my opinion, if a hearing is granted, that the lemon importers have raised a fund estimated at from $40,000 to $75,000, to be used in their campaign to place lemons upon the free list. According to my information, this fund has been obtained in the following manner: An assessment was first made of 5 cents a box upon each box of imported lemons. When this action became public the importers of lemons induced the steamship companies to increase the freight rate on lemons twopence a box, which is a little over 4 cents, and then a rebate equal to the increase in freight per box was granted by the steamship companies, which went into the fund. This action of the importers and the steamship companies, if proven to be true, as I believe it can be, indicates that much of the publicity campaign which has been carried on in favor of putting lemons upon the free list is a purely artificial and manufactured public sentiment. The manner of raising the fund, if it came from domestic transportation companies instead of foreign companies operating upon the ocean, would subject those responsible for the same to the penalties of our laws; but as the fund is made up of rebates given by foreign transportation companies operating upon the high seas, there is no jurisdiction in our laws to deal with such reprehensible action. The knowledge that such a fund has been collected by importers of foreign products and by foreign corporations to be used in a campaign to advance the interests of the foreign producer by methods akin to corruption, and to destroy the domestic producer, ought to result in a demand that even the Democratic majority in this Chamber will not dare ignore; that the domestic grower of lemons be given fair treatment; that he at least receive treatment equal to the foreign producer and importer. Mr. Speaker, we ask fair treatment and demand a hearing.

Sixth. I assert, and I believe it can be shown, that the importation of lemons into the United States is controlled by a very few individuals, who are organized into a drastic combination which follows all the practices of a criminal trust. This small coterie of powerful importers control absolutely the whole business of importation of lemons into this country. I am informed, and I believe my information is correct, that on account of the low prices of lemons in this country at the present time the importers are now reshipping large quantities of lemons, which were destined for the port of New York, to London and other ports in order to systematically starve the market and thus cause high prices in this country, so that these prices may be made to run to the highest level possible between now and the next session of Congress. I think it may be reasonably predicted that owing to the direct manipulation of the importers of foreign lemons that the prices of the product will be artificially advanced because of the action just enumerated for the ulterior purpose of attempting to influence the action of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, the island of Sicily furnishes most of the lemons that go into the markets of the world. In Italy proper and in Spain and in a few other localities lemons are produced, but the great competitor and the most promising rival to the Sicilian grower of lemons is the grower in the State of California. The Sicilian importer now enjoys the larger portion of the market of the United States, and distributes his product to practically all the territory of the United States east of the Missouri River. The California grower of lemons realizes that he is engaged in a tremendous struggle even for a fair share of the market of his own country. He confidently believes that under the American policy of protection he is entitled to at least an equal chance in the markets of his own land. The Democratic Party and those who are against the protective policy may temporarily discourage and embarrass and cause financial loss to the growers of domestic lemons, but the time will come when the friends of the protective policy will demand that this industry, as well as every other industry worthy of protection, shall be accorded that protection, and that the same shall be maintained by the laws of the land.

Seventh. I deny absolutely the statement made by both the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], and other Democratic Members, that there is a domestic Lemon Trust, or anything approximating a trust. Many years ago the citrus-fruit growers of California, after years of struggle with the foreign producers, realized that their industry could be strengthened and the legitimate profits of the industry obtained for the actual growers of the fruit if they could effect an organization and sell in cooperation their product. There followed the organization of various fruit exchanges or associations throughout the territory in California where citrus fruits are grown. These exchanges were represented by a central organization, which became in time to be known as the California Fruit Growers' Exchange. These various associations are made up of actual growers of citrus fruits, and the purpose of the organization is to sell their product in cooperation. This organization does not in any sense fix prices, but simply acts as an agent for the producer so that the actual profits may be retained by the grower. Only about 60 per cent of the area devoted to citrus fruits belongs to the California Fruit Growers' Exchange. A thorough examination of the methods of marketing by this association will show that it is in no sense a trust. In fact, the central agency in selling the product of the grower, other than at auction, first notifies him of the price that can be obtained before the sale is made. About 25 per cent of the product is sold at auction in the open market. Furthermore, except to a very limited extent, it is impossible to artificially raise prices in the sale of perishable articles. The product in question must be sold within a short time after it is ready for market, and for prices regulated by demand and supply. The California Fruit Growers' Exchange endeavors, as the representative of the growers, to place the product of its members in the markets and consuming centers of the country in such quantities and at such times as will supply the demand. It is the purpose of this organization to distribute the product of its members, always with their consent, at those points where the demand is such that the product will be disposed of at fair and reasonable prices. This cooperative organization of the growers is organized for the very purpose of meeting the demands of the market in a fair and reasonable way, and thus obtaining for the farmer or grower the legitimate profit upon his product at prices which the demand and the supply fairly justify. If it were not for this cooperative selling organization carried on by the citrus-fruit growers, the whole industry of marketing these products would be controlled by nongrowers to the profit of the nongrower, and frequently to the loss of the actual grower or farmer. I sincerely trust that the Tariff Board will make a thorough and impartial study of the methods employed by the California Fruit Growers' Exchange in marketing these products, because I have every confidence that if this be done it can result only in a finding that will be favorable and creditable to this organization, and that it will disprove the assertion so flippantly made that there is a Lemon Trust or a Citrus-fruit Trust in this country.

Eighth. The growers of domestic lemons desire a hearing and an investigation in order that they may refute the libel which has been industriously and widely circulated to the effect that the increase in the duty upon lemons was granted in the Payne law in order that the transportation companies might get the benefit. Mr. Speaker, I desire to put before the House the true facts in regard to this matter. For many years the freight rate upon both oranges and lemons from California to all eastern terminals east of Denver was a flat rate, or what is known as a postage-stamp rate, of $1.25 per hundred pounds, which was reduced subsequently to $1.15 per hundred pounds.

Some years ago the growers of lemons in California, on account of the tremendous competition of the Sicilian grower and the low rate of duty upon imported lemons, realized that they were selling their lemons at a loss, and threatened to cease picking the lemon crop, and many of the owners of lemon orchards converted their lemon trees into orange trees by the process of budding and grafting. The transcontinental railroad companies, appreciating that under the circumstances the lemon grower could not continue in business and ship his product to the eastern markets, and not desiring to lose the tonnage which the failure to ship lemons would bring about, voluntarily reduced the rate upon lemons from $1.15 per hundred to $1 per hundred pounds, with the avowed purpose of inducing the lemon grower to continue to ship his lemons. Shortly after the tariff duty on lemons was increased from 1 cent a pound to 1½ cents a pound the freight traffic association of the transcontinental railroads met and raised the freight rate upon lemons to equal the rate charged on oranges—that is, $1.15 a hundred. The citrus-fruit growers of California immediately took the necessary steps in the courts and before the Interstate Commerce Commission to test the reasonableness of the increase made in the lemon rate. At the same time the citrus-fruit growers inaugurated a proceeding before the Interstate Commerce Commission to reduce the freight rate on oranges from $1.15 a hundred to $1 a hundred. The two propositions were tried before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that tribunal decided that a rate of $1 per hundred on lemons was a reasonable rate, and the increased rate attempted to be made by the transcontinental railroad companies has not been collected. I understand an appeal has been taken to the Court of Commerce, where the matter is now pending. The Interstate Commerce Commission decided in the orange rate case that $1.15 a hundred pounds was a reasonable rate, the commission basing its finding for a different rate upon oranges from that of lemons upon the ground that the average haul of oranges (oranges going into all the consuming centers of the East and the bulk of the lemons produced in California being marketed in the consuming centers west of the Missouri River), being greater than the average haul of lemons, justified a greater freight rate. Mr. Speaker, it thus appears that the citrus-fruit growers of California did not acquiesce in the action of the transcontinental railroad companies in their effort to obtain a part of the increase granted by Congress in the lemon duty. On the contrary they promptly and vigorously put forth every effort to retain for the growers of lemons whatever benefit was granted to them by Congress in the increased rate of duty, and unless the Court of Commerce shall reverse the finding of the Interstate Commerce Commission the benefit of the increased duty will remain with the grower. This disposes of another baseless charge which has been widely circulated with the purpose of injuring the lemon grower of California. Of course the action of the railroad companies was unjustifiable and foolish and approved by no one.

Ninth. I am confident that an impartial investigation into the lemon industry in this country and abroad will show that the present duty of 1½ cents per pound on imported lemons should be maintained; that such a rate is no more than sufficient to meet the difference in the cost in the production of this article at home and abroad, and it is especially necessary to maintain the duty at this rate to give that encouragement to the domestic industry which is necessary to attract capital to invest in the industry of planting lemons and the production of that article for the supply of the domestic market.

The lemon growers of this country, instead of raising a vast sum for the purpose of carrying on a campaign to influence public opinion in their behalf, have gone to work in a systematic and honorable way by making a thorough study of the cost of producing lemons in this country and the cost of producing lemons in foreign countries, with a view of ascertaining as far as it is possible the difference in the domestic and foreign cost of production. The citrus-fruit growers of California, in order to make this investigation after long consideration, obtained the services of Mr. G. Harold Powell, who had been for many years the assistant chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, Department of Agriculture, and who is recognized and conceded to be the leading expert upon the lemon industry in the United States, for the purpose of making this investigation. Mr. Powell has recently returned from a trip to Europe, and is now at work upon a detailed report making a comparison of the domestic with the foreign lemon industry. This report is not yet ready. However, I have a letter from Mr. Powell which bears upon this subject, written to me under date of July 5 last, which I shall print with these remarks as an appendix.

I maintain that in levying tariff duties it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to fix a rate that is adequate, not solely to measure the bare difference in the cost of production of the article at home and abroad, but that it must be sufficient to encourage the domestic production of the article. This is especially true and preeminently the case where the article to be produced is of a perishable nature, and where the returns from the investment made in the enterprise can not be expected until five or six years subsequent to the original investment. An enterprise which has for its object the production of a staple article promises an immediate return upon the capital invested. In addition, a staple article such as iron or steel suffers no particular deterioration if it is not marketed immediately when it is ready to be sold. It can be carried from year to year without much loss. Therefore, in fixing a duty upon such an article, if the duty covers the difference in the cost of producing the article at home and abroad, it meets the requirements of a protective policy.

On the other hand, if capital is invested in an enterprise such as the production of lemons for the market, no returns can be expected from the investment short of five or six years. The land must be purchased and prepared for the planting of the orchard and time must elapse for the first crop to be ready for the market, and after the crop is ready for the market it is of a perishable nature and must be disposed of when placed upon the market within a comparatively short time or there is a loss. Those who enter upon such an enterprise are entitled, under our protective policy, to adequate and ample protection. There is a million acres in the State of California suitable for the growing of lemons. A wise policy demands that we should encourage the planting and cultivation of these acres, and I thoroughly believe that if the present duty on lemons can be maintained for the next 10 or 12 years the production of lemons in this country would be expanded to the point where it will supply the domestic demand. Such a result would be of incalculable benefit to the consumers of the United States. It would result in the expansion of the lemon industry to the point now occupied by the orange industry. The orange industry of the United States is now able to meet the demand, and oranges are cheaper in the United States than ever before and are sold in the markets of this country cheaper than apples.

If the Democratic Party and those in sympathy with its efforts upon the tariff question shall succeed in subjecting the lemon industry to the penalty of absolute free trade, it will mean that the domestic production of lemons will be destroyed; that the capital invested will be sacrificed; that the lemon orchards of the country will be transformed into orange orchards or abandoned altogether. This will mean that the Sicilian monopoly will absolutely control the lemon market of the United States, with power to fix prices at whatever figures it desires and which prices the domestic consumer must pay. Under such conditions it is inevitable that prices will be inordinately advanced. Will the people of this country be so indifferent to their true interests as to permit such a consummation? I can not believe that any such result can be accomplished, even though the leader of the Democratic majority upon this floor warns us that such is the purpose of himself and his associates.

Mr. Speaker, I have voted against every tariff bill presented at this session except the measure providing for reciprocity between the United States and Canada, which is a measure standing alone as a distinct policy. Every other tariff measure presented by the Democratic majority has violated every principle of the policy of protection. The wool bill, the free-list bill, and the cotton bill are all measures illy considered, presented to the Congress of the United States without any hearing. Those interested in these industries and affected by these bills were insolently denied an opportunity to be heard. These bills are crowded with examples of Democratic incompetency in tariff making. None of these measures has been considered or reported upon by the Tariff Board. I do not believe that a Republican President will stultify himself by approving any one of these ill-prepared measures. He can perform no greater service to the country and its industries than by promptly vetoing these measures. [Applause on the Republican side.]

APPENDIX.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE
CITRUS PROTECTIVE LEAGUE OF CALIFORNIA,
Los Angeles, Cal., July 5, 1911.

Hon. J. C. NEEDHAM,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. NEEDHAM: I have recently returned from an extended investigation of the citrus-fruit industry of Italy and Spain. My attention has been called to the Daily Consular and Trade Reports of May 20, 1911, which contains an account of lemon growing in Sicily. The report was prepared by Mr. Nicolo Marasa, of Palermo. It was transmitted by Consul Hernando de Soto, of Palermo.

I wish to call your attention to the purpose of the Marasa report and the conditions under which it was prepared. The report was to be placed before committees in Congress to show the cost of producing lemons in Sicily and was to be used by the Italian importers in New York and the exporters in Italy in their combined campaign to place citrus fruits on the free list. I was informed by the Lega Agrumaria, an organization of Palermo exporters, which is handling the tariff campaign in Italy, that Mr. Marasa, who is a Palermo druggist or chemist, is the most competent person that could have been selected in Sicily to prepare the statement desired by the New York lemon importers. A copy of the report was transmitted to the State Department by the consul in Palermo, thereby making the document public at this time.

I do not care to criticize the Marasa report in detail, as the Italian lemon industry will be handled in a comprehensive report later in the season. I would like, however, to make two or three general criticisms. The report purports to show the average cost of producing lemons in Sicily. In order to determine the cost of production, Mr. Marasa has assumed a hypothetical 10-acre grove as representative of the groves in Sicily. He assumes what he thinks it costs to produce the fruit in the field, the proportion of the different grades of fruit, the price the different grades ought to bring, the taxes which should be paid by the owner, and other figures of a similar nature. He concludes from these figures that it costs on the average $1.76 to place a box of Sicilian lemons for export to the United States on board ship in Palermo. The f. o. b. cost is the foundation stone in the Marasa report. The value of the report may be measured by the correctness of this figure.

The Department of Commerce and Labor publishes annually a detailed statement giving the value of lemons imported into the United States. The value is based upon the sworn statement of the exporters of the f. o. b. cost of the fruit and packages. From these figures I find the approximate average f. o. b. cost during the fiscal year 1898 to the exporter was $1.39; in 1899, $1.68; in 1902, $1.46; in 1905, $1.53; in 1909, $1.39; during the fiscal year 1910, before the Payne-Aldrich Act became effective, $1.57; after the act became effective, $1.39. In two years only since 1898 has the average f. o. b. cost of the lemons exported to the United States from Italy, as sworn to by the exporters, equaled the assumed figures in the Marasa report. Either the sworn statements of the exporters are incorrect or the f. o. b. cost, as given by Marasa, is valueless.

In order to arrive at the profits in lemon growing in Sicily, Mr. Marasa divides the fruit produced by this grove into three grades—40 per cent, No. 1; 40 per cent, No. 2; and 20 per cent, No. 3. He assumes that the No. 1 fruit costs the exporter on the average $1.15 per box; the No. 2 fruit, 58 cents per box; and the No. 3 fruit, 29 cents per box. He states that the fruit of first quality is exclusively shipped to the United States, while the second-quality fruit is used largely for export to European countries. In an official report published in Rome in 1911, in which lemon growing in the Province of Messina is treated, the following occurs:

"The price of a choice and an inferior fruit varies enormously according to the year and the trade demand; the best lemons sell at 50 francs and up per 1,000 and they are all sent to London."

This equals $3.22 per box for the fruit alone. The entire crop of No. 1 fruit in Italy is not exported to the United States, as represented by Marasa, and has not been for many years. All of the northern countries of Europe, including Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Russia, Austria, and London in England, take a large proportion of the highest grade. The highest priced lemons of Italy are shipped to Russia.

In order to show a low net return on the investment and a high average f. o. b. cost to the United States, Marasa has assumed that the grower is paid a high price for the No. 1 fruit, all of which he consigns to the United States, and a low price for the fruit that is shipped to Europe. The weekly prices of the different sizes and grades of lemons at the packing house, exclusive of packing charges, are published by the Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Palermo. From these figures the average annual price for the sizes of No. 1 fruit which are exported to the United States was about $1 a box in 1910, instead of $1.15 as given by Marasa; in 1909, about 80 cents per box; 80 cents per box in 1908; $1.33 per box in 1907; and 75 cents per box in 1904. The average price of the sizes of No. 1 fruit, which are practically all shipped to European markets, brought the producer, instead of 58 cents per box as given by Mr. Marasa, an average of about $1.07 per box in 1910, 87 cents in 1909, 87 cents in 1908, and more than $1.33 in 1906 and 1907. The average price of No. 2 fruit, which Mr. Marasa assumes at 58 cents, is either incorrect or the detailed quotations of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Palermo have been misleading since the beginning of the publication of these figures by the organization.

I desire to call your attention also to the present status of the lemon industry of the United States. Since the passage of the Payne-Aldrich Act, which increased the duty from 1 cent to 1½ cents per pound, the production of California lemons has increased 25 per cent and the acreage has increased nearly 30 per cent. The shipments of lemons from California in May, 1909, were 709 carloads; in 1911 they were 1,010 carloads; in June, 1909, they were 881 carloads; in 1911, 1,180 carloads. The average price f. o. b. California for all lemons sold during the week ending July 1, 1909, was approximately $4.63; the number of cars sold was 113. The average f. o. b. price of all cars of lemons sold during the corresponding period in 1911 was $3.16; the number of cars sold was 141. The average price received for lemons during the week preceding July 4 is generally one of the highest of the summer.

I desire to call your attention also to the present status of the lemon-importing business. During the fiscal year 1910, the year following the increase in the duty on lemons, the imports equaled 25,366,546 pounds more than the year preceding, when the duty was 1 cent per pound, and more than 7,000,000 pounds above the average imports for the preceding 10 years. The revenue collected on imported lemons by the Government during the fiscal year 1909 was $1,350,738.88. In 1910, which includes 11 months after the duty was raised, the Government collected $2,233,526.87, the largest revenue collected in the history of the importing-lemon business.

At the present time Italian lemons are coming to the United States in unprecedented quantities. The following statement from the records of the New York Fruit Exchange shows the approximate number of boxes of lemons reported afloat or in the port of New York unsold during the month of June, from 1909 to 1911, inclusive.

Foreign lemons reported afloat and in the port of New York unsold.

Week ending—	1911	1910	1909
	Boxes.	Boxes.	Boxes.
June 2	227,650	246,800	181,650
June 9	280,325	243,600	209,930
June 16	230,600	224,850	166,650
June 23	250,000	175,000	175,000
June 30	280,000	170,000	204,000

These records, with the official statistics, show the tremendous increase in imports of lemons, the increase in revenue collected by the Government since the Payne-Aldrich Act went into effect, and the decrease in the present prices of fruit.

I am sending a copy of this letter to Hon. JOHN D. WORKS, of the Senate.

Yours, very truly, G. HAROLD POWELL,
Secretary and Manager.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes allotted me I will not be able to present to you figures and statistics determining the exact amount of tariff that should properly be placed on lemons imported into the United States, nor could I give them to you at this time even if I had several hours in which to discuss this question. They are not yet ready. They are being gathered, assembled, tabulated, and verified in order to be ready for presentation to this House or to its Ways and Means Committee when considering the question of a just and correct tariff on lemons at the regular session of the Sixty-second Congress.

The lemon industry, realizing that it must take its turn with other industries in explaining its position to Congress, has been actively engaged in gathering information and statistics for the correct solving of the tariff problem so far as it relates to the lemon industry. Experts have been sent to foreign lemon-growing districts and have there obtained a vast quantity of information, which is being verified and compiled, with the particular view of enabling the Congress of the United States to determine what is a just and a fair rate to be placed upon lemons coming to the United States from foreign countries. The lemon industry does not desire further guessing. The facts only are desired, and so, at a cost to them of thousands of dollars, there is being collected at home and abroad exact and absolutely reliable information for the use of Congress.

Before Congress can intelligently determine what is a reasonable tariff rate for lemons we should know the cost of labor in foreign lemon districts, and how that labor lives, the relative costs of lands, of irrigating, of fumigating, of pruning, of cultivating, of soil covering, and all other items incident to the production of lemons. We should know the relative costs of storage, of sweating, wrapping, packing, orchard and country road transportation, also the general cost of transportation from shipping point to point of consumption. We should know the selling costs, the loss from rot, the retail selling prices here and elsewhere now and in years gone by. We should have the fullest and most accurate figures concerning the importations of lemons.

The gentleman from New York, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 3, stated to this House that—

> The immediate result of the Payne-Aldrich tariff raise in lemons was that the importation of lemons for the last fiscal year decreased over 10,000,000 pounds.

This was a very misleading statement, for the facts are that the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, the first year of the Payne-Aldrich tariff, shows the importations of lemons not to have decreased, but to have increased more than 25,000,000 pounds over the year ending June 30, 1909, the last year of the old tariff. And the year ending June 30, 1911, the second year of the new tariff, shows the total imports of lemons into the United States to have differed only fifteen one-hundredths of 1 per cent from the total imports of the year ending June 30, 1909, the last year of the old tariff. And, mark you, if you will total the imports of lemons for the two fiscal years of July 1, 1909, to June 30, 1911, under the new tariff act, and then compare the figures with those for 1909, the last year of the old tariff, you will find that for two years past, under the new tariff, the monthly importation of lemons has averaged approximately 12,300,000 pounds, while for the year 1909, the last year of the old tariff, the monthly average was only 11,200,000 pounds; and for the years 1905, 1906, 1907, 1908, and 1909, the five years immediately preceding the Payne-Aldrich tariff, the monthly average was 12,250,000 pounds.

These figures show an increased importation for two years under the new tariff, as compared with the last year of the old tariff, of 1,100,000 pounds per month, and an increased monthly importation for two years under the new tariff, as compared with the last five years of the old tariff, of 50,000 pounds per month.

Again, official figures will show importations of lemons approximately as follows:

	1909	1910	1911
	Boxes.	Boxes.	Boxes.
June	238,500	307,000	359,550
July	330,600	265,000	387,525
Total	569,100	572,000	747,075

An increase for June and July, 1911, over same months in 1910, of 175,075 boxes, approximately 12,780,475 pounds, and an increase over same months in 1909 of 177,975 boxes, approximately 13,992,175 pounds.

These figures are practically correct. Can any fair-minded man still maintain that an increased tariff has decreased the importation of lemons?

Now a word as to prices.

I believe it can be shown that the price of lemons under the new law is less than the price under the old law. I know that within the last two months I have repeatedly seen lemons for sale on the street corners of Washington at 1 cent each. I examined them and found them sound and good, and I have actually purchased lemons in Central Market, Washington, the principal public market of this city, for 15 cents per dozen, and they were very good lemons, too, not the finest, but as good as are generally used, and lemons can be bought to-day at from 10 to 15 cents per dozen in every market in this city.

Again, all sales of lemons in New York City are made at public auction, and the closing sale prices for the week of August 5, 1911, and same weeks in 1908 and 1907 are as follows:

	Week ending Aug. 5, 1911.	Week ending Aug. 5, 1908.	Week ending Aug. 5, 1907.
First choice, 300	$2.50 to $4.63	$3.85 to $4.50	$3.38 to $4.75
Second choice, 300	2.00 to 3.50	3.15 to 3.95	2.63 to 4.25
First choice, 360	2.50 to 4.00	3.10 to 3.65	3.63 to 4.75
Second choice, 360	2.00 to 3.00	2.70 to 3.25	2.75 to 4.25
Small sizes	1.75 to 3.25	2.52 to 2.75	2.25 to 3.50

In the Washington Times of August 8, 1911, placed in a prominent place, not as market items, but as interesting reading matter, was the following:

WAR-TIME PRICES LOWER THAN NOW—HOUSEWIFE THEN OBTAINED FLOUR, MEATS, LARD, BUTTER, AND CHEESE AT SMALLER COST—SUGAR ALONE SOLD AT HIGHER FIGURE.

Cost of food during war and at present.

Articles.	War time.	Present.
Flour	$4.10-$4.25	$7.75.
Pork	14 cents per pound	18-20 cents per pound.
Hams	6½ cents per pound	20-28 cents per pound.
Lard	8-12 cents per pound	12½ cents per pound.
Butter	15-20 cents per pound	30-35 cents per pound.
Cheese	14 cents per pound	25 cents per pound.
Sugar	10-18 cents per pound	6-7 cents per pound.
Molasses	30-35 cents per gallon	32-38 cents per gallon.
Beef	6½ cents per pound	15 cents per pound.
Shoulders	5 cents per pound	20 cents per pound.
Coffee	13-16 cents per pound	25-40 cents per pound.

If those figures are true, do you not think the growers of lemons in California have done a remarkable thing for the people of this country in keeping the price of lemons to 10, 12, 15, and 20 cents per dozen? Does not the price of lemons compare favorably with any other fruit sold in the market? I have priced lemons in the Washington market for many weeks, and found them at from 1 to 1½ cents each, while at the same time apples were selling at 5 to 10 cents each, and peaches at 3 to 7 cents each. Some have said, "Well, we have paid as high as 3 cents each for lemons." Perhaps so, for there are few, if any, farm products that are not abnormally high at times. I have paid 65 cents per dozen for eggs and 80 cents per pound for butter; yet no one maintains that such are the average prices of these commodities.

Potatoes—plain, old-fashioned Irish potatoes—are selling to-day in all our markets at very high prices. This very morning, in the market of Washington, I personally purchased potatoes in the usual household way, and counted them afterwards, and found that in one instance I had paid 1 cent each, or 12 cents per dozen, for potatoes a little smaller than medium size, and in the other instance 2 cents each, or 20 cents per dozen, for large, but not the largest, size potatoes.

If peaches and apples and even plain, everyday potatoes must at times sell at such prices, is it strange that lemons should occasionally take the same course? Especially when supply is never closely related to demand, and can not be wherever imported lemons control the market. Nor can prices of lemons be kept from becoming abnormally high where shipload after shipload of trust-controlled foreign lemons can be dumped on the market or into the ocean in order to control the market.

Again, as to the prices of lemons, I call your attention to the fact that in eastern Canada, which places no import duty on lemons, the prices to the consumer are approximately the same, though sometimes higher than in Eastern United States, where we do, and should continue to place an adequate duty on lemons, not alone for the grower, but also for the consumer of lemons.

Given a tariff fair and just to the American grower, the American laborer and the American consumer, California growers will, in a few short years, furnish lemons to the whole United States at prices reasonable to the user.

The enemies of American industry say that the California lemon industry is a trust. It will be proven to you, and to your satisfaction, too, that the lemon industry in California is not a trust, and can not be; that the members of the local associations and of the central associations are all lemon growers; that these local associations and central organizations work, not to artificially raise prices, but to gather and disseminate information that will cause their product to be distributed according to the laws of supply and demand, thus giving to the consumer, and obtaining for themselves, a fair price. These central organizations do not control the prices, nor even the destination of shipments, for each grower and shipper—and the shipper is the grower, and the grower is the shipper nearly always—can name his own price and determine the destination for his shipment and have returns made direct to him from the association agent selling his fruit. Again, the owner is notified if his orginal price can not be obtained, and the fruit is then disposed of according to the owner's new instruction.

As to the supply:

California now has between 25,000 and 30,000 acres of lemons and supplies almost half the lemons consumed in the United States. There are at least 60,000 acres additional in southern California suitable for the raising of lemons. Southern California alone can in a few years, if protected by a fair tariff, raise enough lemons to meet the total consumption of the United States. But as a further assurance that California can without question meet every possible demand, if given a sure and certain protection, there is a section of the great San Joaquin Valley of California that has begun to grow lemons and is able to put them into the market at a season when there are few imported lemons. In this valley there are more than 100,000 acres capable of producing lemons, and will be made to produce them at a moderate cost to the consumer and moderate profit to the grower if given a fair and equitable tariff rate. The production has grown and the acreage planted to lemons in California has increased more than 30 per cent since the present tariff act was passed.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the Democratic Party should not murder a great industry without giving it some reasonable opportunity for presenting its case, of defending its very life. Many millions of dollars and many thousands of homes and families are now dependent upon this industry. They should not have their means of livelihood strangled without any chance whatever to plead. Is the Democratic majority of this House satisfied to play the part of a commercial assassin and in five minutes strike down a great American industry without giving it any chance whatever to show its right to live?

I am in receipt of a message from the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, which reads, in part, as follows:

One of California's most important industries is the growing of lemons. It is conspicuously free from trust influence, farmers and fruit raisers avoiding middlemen and speculators by marketing their products through their own organizations. At vast expense of patience and capital our citrus-fruit growers have built up a great industry, from which they pay large taxes to sustain Government schools and humane institutions, to which, if duty be removed, our competitors will contribute nothing, thus placing them at great advantage in our own markets, in addition to the difference in their favor on cheaper labor and lower freight rates between place of production and great centers of American population.

The following telegrams likewise show how our lemon growers feel upon this subject:

SAN DIMAS, CAL., August 9, 1911.

Hon. W. D. STEPHENS, Washington, D. C.:

Urge that nothing be done reducing tariff on lemons at this time, or until after completion of report to Congress regarding conditions here and in Italy. This district starting many young lemon orchards under present tariff. Change at this time would completely discourage any further planting, as it requires six years' time to get orchard in bearing from time of planting.

Representative WM. D. STEPHENS,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

In simple justice to thousands of lemon growers, many of whom have invested their all, we earnestly protest against any reduction in the lemon tariff until we have been allowed to present our case before the regular tariff committee and the case decided on its merits. We ask fair play.

LEFFINGWELL RANCHERS' ASSOCIATION.

PASADENA, CAL., August 9, 1911.

Representative WM. D. STEPHENS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

In simple justice to the lemon growers of California, who have millions of dollars invested in the business, please use your influence to delay any action on lemon tariff until such time as there can be a thorough and fair investigation of same.

WHITTIER, CAL., August 10, 1911.

Hon. WM. D. STEPHENS,
Care of House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We urge you to put forth every effort to prevent any reduction in the lemon tariff at this time. Proposed change would be disastrous to California citrus interests and manifestly unfair without due hearing and consideration of comparative conditions here and in Sicily.

I do not ask at your hands at this time any particular tariff rate, only that which after fair and full investigation is found to be fair and just and right for both grower and consumer. I was not sent to this Congress to advocate or stand for any tariff, even on lemons, that is unfair to the American people, and I am trying to do my duty as my conscience dictates. I hope never to vote for or against any bill through pique, but always to work and vote for the interests of the whole people. I shall not advocate a tariff on lemons of one rate or another until after the facts and figures have all been shown me. When a rate fair and just to consumer and grower has been clearly demonstrated, then I will advocate such a rate; no more, no less.

All the lemon grower asks is justice.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the motions offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and I shall do it with some compassion for him. A few days ago there was none so great as the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, who held the House under his thumb awaiting his will and abiding his judgment. The gentleman from Alabama had only to crook his finger and the House did as he said. He had supplanted the Speaker of the House in influence; he had become himself, in effect, the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the House itself. But, lo and behold, he went into a conflict with another gentleman, another gentleman who bestrides this Capitol like a colossus, with one foot upon the House of Representatives and the other foot upon the Senate of the United States, with both branches beneath his feet and both doing as he commands. The gentleman from Alabama, with a solid majority behind him in the House, backed by a Democratic Congress, mighty here where they have a superior number, went into the conflict, yielded first on the wool bill, getting a little compromise with the Senator from Wisconsin, and yet completely, in effect, yielding. He takes his lesson good naturedly, but understandingly. Having effected some kind of a small compromise with the Senator from Wisconsin on the wool bill, he understands now what he is doing. He does not describe this as "a compromise." He describes it as "a surrender." [Applause on the Republican side.]

There seems some excuse for my genial friend from Alabama. He is new in charge of conferences. He has heard for the first time that old senatorial bluff about the Senate never yielding. On this side of the House there are many gentlemen who have heard that trite remark many times, knowing it was a very "cold bluff."

Why, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Alabama had tried to escape an agreement on the wool bill, the Senate would have pursued him to the farthest corners of the earth to effect an agreement. Nothing could have prevented the Senator from Wisconsin and other Senators from coming to an agreement upon the wool bill or from getting this bill presented to the President of the United States, and while the Senate conferees said they would not yield, yet if the gentleman from Alabama had had the nerve with which I had credited him and the experience which he ought to have had, he would have laid down the law on behalf of the House of Representatives to the Senate, and the Senate would have yielded at every place and on every line. [Applause on the Republican side.]

This bill was defeated by a narrow margin, a tie vote, in the Senate. Tell me that it would not carry if the gentleman from Alabama had declined to yield! A pro forma disagreement comes to us now from the Senate; a pro forma disagreement. But if a real disagreement had been enunciated on behalf of the House, the Senate would have yielded, and the gentleman from Alabama would have come back to the House with credit, instead of being a discredited tool of another man. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was considered in the House I addressed the House, having an hour's time, expressing my views touching it. I shall not now take any time at all except to say that, if I understand the Senate amendment, it limits the House bill as to certain items. The House bill gave free trade with all the world, which meant Australasia, practically, and Argentina, the two great meat-producing countries that have large exports.

Now the Senate amendment No. 5, on page 3, not only has the effect, if I understand it—and I want to be corrected if I do not—of not changing the reciprocal agreement in the event Canada consents to it, but it has the further effect that Argentina and Australasia—they being practically the two countries that have a surplus that compete with us—can not get free entry into our markets unless there is a reciprocal agreement of some kind made with Argentina and with Australasia—one or both. Any kind of an old reciprocal agreement, that might cover hairpins or anything else, would be sufficient to entitle, in the event the Senate amendment is agreed to, free entrance from Argentina and Australasia for their meats. I hope I will be corrected if I am wrong about that. But that takes future action; and unless there is to obtain some new-fangled proposition to originate revenue bills other than in the House and let the majority make a treaty, we are safe, at least so far as the meat producers and the farmers of this country are concerned. It takes future action. Therefore, if I understand it, I shall vote for amendment No. 5.

Ah, the gentleman from Alabama agonizes over the proposition that we can not have free meats with all the world. What does he mean by that? Argentina, a great producer of meat, a great producer of wheat, a great producer of corn, with cheap lands, has a freight rate—and so has Australasia—to the United States by the ocean less than we have in the Middle West from St. Louis or Chicago or Minneapolis to the seaboard.

I can not sympathize with my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] upon this side of the House. He, too, agonizes for legislation that would let Argentina and Australasia into our markets without duty. We part company there; but I am delighted—O heavenly Father, I am delighted—to see the burning brand of reform from California [Mr. STEPHENS], when one single article—lemons—is touched by the House amendment, that you now propose to back away from; I am delighted to see the gentleman from California rush to the defense of the duty on lemons. I am quite willing that the House should recede as to this California product, because I am a protectionist for California as well as every other part of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.] I believe in the protective policy for all the people. Therefore I will vote for the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to recede from the House amendment placing lemons on the free list.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I give the gentleman one more minute.

Mr. CANNON. I will vote for the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to recede, because I would go as far to protect Alabama and the whole South and California and the whole West as I would to protect Illinois in her industries, or any other State in her industries, and I decline to let the reformer from California [Mr. STEPHENS]—who falls over himself to vote with the Democratic side on everything except lemons—or the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], or the other side of the House, make for me my policy touching protection. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, I have no patience with Representatives on either side of the House who vote to protect articles produced in their districts or States and against protection on articles produced in other States. I believe in the policy of protection from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot; and, thank God, there are a majority of those on this side of the House who believe in it and will keep the faith. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. PAYNE. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that he use some of his time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL].

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this House ought to draw clearly the lines of debate. For representatives of the people to speak in such phrase and in such guise that the effect is to deceive the people whom they represent is not becoming to the Members of this House.

The question before us is the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to recede from our disagreement to Senate amendment No. 5—and it will be followed by a similar motion in reference to No. 7—and to agree to the amendment with an amendment striking out the word "corn."

The House bill went to the Senate providing for free bread, free meats, and so forth:

Buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, rye flour, bran, middlings, and other offals of grain, oatmeal and rolled oats, and all prepared cereal foods, biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened.

Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, fresh, salted, pickled, dried, smoked, dressed or undressed, prepared or preserved in any manner, bacon, hams, shoulders, lard, lard compound and lard substitutes, sausage and sausage meats.

The leader of the minority has seen proper to state that in the Senate the Democrats, recreant to their pledges and to their duty, and acting contrary to the will of the party in this House, defeated this provision in the House bill.

The gentleman ought to know that in the Senate every man bearing a Democratic commission, save one, voted for the House bill as it passed the House, but the Republican Senate voted it down with the help of this one Senator on the Democratic side. An amendment was then proposed, he says, by a Democrat, which is true; doing the best that he could after the House bill was voted down, proposing this amendment of the Senate, which would evidently, in his opinion, bring in free bread and free meat, at least from Canada, and from other nations as from time to time reciprocal agreements might be made. It at least gives some opportunity to the people of the United States to get their bread and meat untaxed. The amendment referred to, which was added to both the bread and meat sections of the House bill, is as follows: Coming from any foreign country with which the United States has a reciprocal trade agreement and which shall admit from the United States free of duty, cotton, corn, wheat, oats, horses, cattle, and hogs. Yet gentlemen on that side, those who vote every time for the protected manufacturer, those who boast that they stand for the principle of protection, endeavor to put the Democratic Party in the attitude of being opposed to free bread and free meat because the Republicans and one Democrat in the Senate did it. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] says that we have swapped free bread and free meat for cotton bagging and ties. We have swapped nothing.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. No; I can not allow an interruption. I only have five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman refuses to yield.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. If I misstate the gentleman, I will permit him to correct me.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman, of course, endeavors to be candid with the Members of this House and with his own constituents. He would not deceive anybody by the words he would use, nor the manner in which he would use them. Certainly not. As a matter of honor he would not do it, but it is a strange circumstance that he did not mention the other things of interest to the farmer and the consumer in this bill. He mentions cotton bagging and ties because of interest to the South. The gentleman from Illinois, the former Speaker of this House, also failed to mention the advantages afforded by this bill to the farmers of this country outside of the South.

We find that all agricultural implements, tools, machinery, wagons, harness, saddles, bags for grain, wire and iron for fencing, boots and shoes are relieved from taxation and are admitted into this country free from all the world.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. A moment ago the Chair informed the gentleman from New York that he had 10 minutes remaining. That was a mistake, there is only 5 minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. I understood the Chair to say 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; the Chair said 5 minutes, and the gentleman from Alabama has 13 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes more to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the effect of this motion, striking out the word "corn" from the Senate amendments, means that, adopting the Senate amendments—if the reciprocity bill should be adopted by Canada—we would have free breadstuffs and free meat from Canada. With the word "corn" remaining in the amendments, it would amount to nothing, because corn for distilling purposes is not admitted into Canada free from this country. I favor, and I believe that this side of the House will favor, a motion to agree to the two amendments striking out the word "corn," in order that we may get the nearest relief we can and approach as near as possible to free bread and free meat, and insure that this bill, which is so beneficial to the farmers and consumers of the United States, shall be sent to the President, giving him an opportunity to furnish the country this long-promised relief. And I want to say to gentlemen on that side who opposed the Canadian reciprocity bill, if the President does not sign this bill, it will show that the criticism they made of him was correct.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time. I desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, which I shall not do in the case of the gentleman from Texas, I want to give this warning——

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend some remarks in the RECORD by inserting some letters from the consul general in Germany in regard to the construction of roads.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, for fear the gentleman will insert "applause" after every line, I shall object until that question is decided.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not going to pass on that proposition. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it was particularly appropriate that the discussion on that side of the House should be opened by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], because he is conspicuous from the fact that he is the one prominent Republican in the House that is in favor of putting meat on the free list, and that probably is the secret reason that he was not put on the conference committee on the Payne bill, where his position on the Ways and Means Committee entitled him to be.

It will not do to say that the Democrats are surrendering on free meat and free bread. The bill as it passed the Democratic House had these provisions, and it was defeated in a Republican Senate. The Republicans in the last Congress passed a bill revising the tariff, and refused to put meat on the free list. A bill was introduced subsequently suspending the duty on meat for one year, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] said that he would not call the Ways and Means Committee together to consider the bill because it was apparent that the Republicans would not report it favorably. So that no one could reasonably expect relief from the Republicans from the duty on meat.

It is somewhat amusing to hear gentlemen on that side complaining because the Democratic House is compelled to take the best bill it can get from a Republican Senate. Some gentlemen on that side made elaborate arguments when this bill was under consideration in the House to demonstrate that if meat were placed on the free list it would not be of any benefit to the consumer, but that it would be peculiarly beneficial to the American packers who have already absorbed all the packing establishments in the Argentine Republic. Everyone took that argument with a grain of salt, because the Republican Party's record has been such that we all know that if free meat would have been of benefit to American packers it would have long since been made free in a Republican Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, Bradstreet's index shows that the price of foodstuffs has increased 7 per cent since the 1st of July. Within a few days we have passed a number of bills giving relief to homesteaders in the West because of the prevalent excessive drought and because it is notorious that they will not be able to comply with the law if they are compelled to remain on their homesteads during the period fixed by law. As a result of this excessive drought, extending through the entire West, no grass-fed cattle are now coming to the packing establishments—and it is well known that the price of meat as a result of that condition alone will be higher than it has ever been in the history of the country—and yet there is no hope for any relief for the people so long as the Senate and the Executive are controlled by Republicans. Gentlemen say, Why not insist upon free meat and free bread from the entire world? It is a well-known fact that the President is to veto this bill, and if it contained provisions for free meat and free bread it would merely accelerate his action in sending his veto message to the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Speaker, I consider it the greatest crime of civilization that a system of taxation should be continued in force in a country like ours, which places the greatest burdens upon the food and the clothing that the great masses of the people must have in order to exist. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Republican Party, which had control of the entire Government, both Houses of Congress and the Executive, for a long period of time, steadfastly refused to give relief. Ignoring the lesson of the last election, by which the Democrats were placed in control of the House in a campaign in which the great issue was the high cost of living, the Republicans in both Houses of Congress refuse to aid the Democrats, coming fresh from the people with their mandate to reduce the burdens on the necessities of life. The Democratic Party finds itself in a position where it is held up and impeded when it attempts to give that full relief to the people to which they are entitled. I know that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is sincerely in favor of taking the burdens off the people by putting meat and bread on the free list—as much so as anyone in this House—and I know from an investigation and inquiries of my own that he has done everything in his power to bring about such a result.

The question now is whether we shall give the President an opportunity to afford some relief by taking the duties off of agricultural implements, by admitting free to this country boots and shoes of all kinds, by admitting free to this country sewing machines and barbed wire and cotton ties and bagging, so that at least some measure of relief will be afforded, or whether we shall sit here obstinate in our pride and decline to do anything at all because we can not have our own way? [Applause on the Democratic side.] While this bill would be far preferable to me if it had free meat and free bread from all the world, realizing that such provisions can not be had with a recalcitrant Republican Senate, and knowing that it will be vetoed in any event by a Republican President, I favor its passage in the hope that the people will realize that it is essential that a Democratic victory be had in 1912 in order to give the people the full measure of relief which they justly demand. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, you would think from hearing him talk that my colleague [Mr. FITZGERALD] who has just taken his seat was really and earnestly and insistently for free meat. How about his action? This free-list bill went to the Senate, and there was a tie vote on passing it, just as it came from the House, a tie vote on the proposition of free meat from all the world. Since then the Nation mourns the death of one Senator, which would change that tie vote into a majority for this bill as it came from the House. Is there anything clearer than that? I challenge one of you gentlemen there who is shouting and applauding for free meat to get up here and vote against this amendment which gives away the whole thing on meat. Do you dare to do it? Why not put it up to the Senate and let them vote again on this proposition for free meat and free flour? It was lost by a tie vote. The vote of one man who voted against it has been lost since that time by death. You hold the floor. Why do not you have the courage of your convictions and put it up to the Senate and demand that they take a vote on free meat and free flour, if you want it?

Oh, my friend says the bill is going to the President and the President is going to veto it. Very well, if the people of this country are with you in your demands, not in your actions, and want free meat and free flour, why do you not put that proposition up to the President and let him veto that and go to the country on that issue?

The Senate put a joker in the bill in this corn business. It would not even give us free meat from Canada or free flour from Canada. Our friends come pretty near accepting it. Finally they strike out corn, because there is a duty on corn going into Canada for distilling purposes, because the Canadians insist on protecting their rye used for distilling purposes, and so corn is to be stricken out, and we are to have free meat from Canada, and everybody knows that that will not make any difference to the price of meat in this country or the price of meat in Canada. With the little production of meat and flour there is in Canada that may come across the border in some localities, it will not at all affect the general result. And still you go shouting about free meat and free flour.

Why, Mr. Speaker, nearly every item here put on the free list in this bill is made from material that bears a duty all along the line. There is hardly a thing that you can mention, even the Senate amendment putting on cement, an article on which there is a duty on what is called "raw material," and you propose to accept it. And so it goes through your whole bill, and with the exception of lumber and possibly with the exception of cotton used in cotton bagging, the material may be on the free list, but on everything else there is a duty on the material which you have not the industry to investigate or remove, or else you have not the courage to do it; I do not know which. You leave it there and bring in this incongruous bill on which no man in the United States can figure the amount of revenue that will be cut out under it because of the articles you put on the free list, and which can only be determined by the action of the court hereafter.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, to hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] arise in his seat and advocate free meat and free bread, when that very same gentleman from New York voted against this free-list bill, spoke against it, and more than that, when he was chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, refused to give relief to the American people when he had the opportunity to do so [applause on the Democratic side], makes me think that the speech he has just made does not come honestly from either his brain or his heart. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. And the gentleman says that after the recent change of the gentleman himself on the very bill and on this proposition in the last two months.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman what I stated a minute ago, there is no change so far as I am concerned, there is no change so far as this side of the House is concerned, but we have to face an adverse majority at the other end of the Capitol. We have to face a President who is not of our political faith, and I will say to the gentleman from New York that I and my confrères on the conference committee insisted before anything should be done in reference to striking out the free meat and free bread from this bill that this question should go back to the United States Senate for a vote, and it did go back there. They had an opportunity to reverse their action. They refused to do it, and in less than 24 hours the leader of the Republicans in the Senate, who was disposed to play fair with the American people, the only man whom we can trust outside of the Democrats in the Senate to do justice to the American consumer, told me that if this bill was sent back to the Senate insisting on free bread and free meat that it meant the death of the bill. There are men on this side of the House here who heard that statement. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, under those conditions, the only question that confronted us was whether we would deadlock this proposition and give no relief to the American people or whether we would accept such relief as a Republican Senate was willing to concede.

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. I would ask the gentleman whether he is disposed to take the statement of a single Senator, one of the conferees, or to take an actual vote in the Senate when it stood a tie on a former vote, and there has been a change of one since that vote was taken.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from New York, when this bill went back to the Senate, if there had been a majority for it, if the Democrats who were in favor of free meat and free bread could have summoned a majority they would have passed that; but some of the men who voted——

Mr. PAYNE rose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I must decline to yield now, but some of the men who voted before for free bread and free meat are unwilling to do so now. Now, as to the statement of the gentleman from Connecticut about the adoption of free bread and free meat, my friend from Connecticut was not willing to join this side of the House to vote for this bill in order to give his people free bread and free meat. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the first motion that I made, to concur in the Senate amendment No. 5 with an amendment striking out the word "corn," on page 11.

Mr. MANN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment. I do not know as there is any difference in the parliamentary situation. The first motion is a motion that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment, and the gentleman would offer a motion to concur with an amendment. Of course, that is divisible. The first question is whether the House would recede from its disagreement, and then the gentleman's motion to amend at that stage would probably take precedence of the motion to concur.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, my motion is a motion to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment striking out the word "corn."

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not yet put the motion for the previous question.

Mr. MANN. The previous question would not cut out a prior motion, anyhow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware of that.

Mr. MANN. The motion must be to recede from the disagreement. That is divisible, if anybody wants it divided.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, my motion is that we recede from our disagreement to amendment No. 5 and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment striking out the word "corn" in line 11.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois offer a motion to concur?

Mr. MANN. I do not at this stage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair requests the gentleman from Alabama to state his motion again.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My motion is to recede from our disagreement to Senate amendment No. 5 and to concur in the same with an amendment to strike out the word "corn" in line 11, page 3.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 5 and concur in the same with an amendment striking out the word "corn." The Chair will ask the gentleman from Alabama if the Chair has stated his motion correctly?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is correct.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I make the same motion in reference to Senate amendment No. 7. I move to recede from our disagreement to Senate amendment No. 7 and concur in the amendment with an amendment striking out the word "corn" in line 19, page 3.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 7 and concur with an amendment striking out the word "corn" in line 19, page 3.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of the printed bill.

The SPEAKER. Of the printed bill. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to recede from the House amendment, adding the words "and lemons" to Senate amendment No. 8.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House recede from its amendment to Senate amendment No. 8, adding the words "and lemons." The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to recede from the House disagreement to Senate amendment No. 8 and to concur in the same.

Mr. MANN. We have not disagreed to Senate amendment No. 8.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman is right. We have not disagreed. I move to concur in Senate amendment No. 8.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves to concur in Senate amendment No. 8.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division. First, I would like to have the amendment reported, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Roman, Portland, and other hydraulic cement, and lime.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LENROOT. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to say that the House did not disagree to that amendment, and, therefore, we should not recede. That is not correct. Did not the House recede?

Mr. MANN. We concurred with an amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Illinois is correct. I overlooked the fact that we concurred with an amendment and did not disagree.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and on a rising vote there were—ayes 160, noes 102.

So the Senate amendment No. 8 was concurred in.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the various amendments were disposed of was laid on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] rises to a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to inquire particularly of the gentleman from Alabama if he does not want to make a motion now to agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing to agree to.

Mr. NORRIS. There is still a disagreement, as I understand. This amendment striking out "corn" leaves it still in disagreement.

Mr. MANN. The House has agreed to that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Nebraska that I have not asked to agree to a conference, because no conference is needed.

The SPEAKER. If the House has agreed to the entire matter there is nothing else left.

PUBLICITY OF CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to submit to the House a conference report on the bill H. R. 2958, requiring publicity of campaign contributions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] calls up the conference report on the publicity bill, and the Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

H. R. 2958, to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections in which Representatives in Congress are elected."

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I wish to inquire on what page of the RECORD this report is printed?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk simply read the title of the bill, so that Members can send out and get copies of it. Does the gentleman from Missouri know where this report is printed in the RECORD?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I understand the gentleman from Illinois has been informed by a Democrat—the true source of all his information. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I asked for information, but no Democrat was able to give it. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. A Democrat did give it, and the gentleman ought to correct that statement. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT. It is on page 3920.

The SPEAKER. The report is printed on page 3920 of the RECORD of August 14.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry with reference to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, all the conferees being in favor of the conference report, will the time for the discussion of the conference report be permitted to be controlled by those who are opposed to it who are not among the conferees, under the practice of the House?

Mr. MANN. If the previous question were ordered, there would be no time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if there is any time for debate somebody who is opposed to the report should be recognized.

Mr. BARTLETT. There are some. I am opposed to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there will be no trouble about it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor and do not yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia rose to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly in order. The Chair submitted a question as to whether there was an objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is in order. There is no trouble about that. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. BARTLETT. Reserving the right to object to the request of the gentleman from Missouri, I desire to ask him if there is any purpose on his part to permit discussion on this conference report?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, answering the gentleman, I suppose he simply desires me to say publicly what I have said to him privately—that I have no objection on earth to any discussion that the House wants to hear.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman has it in his power to control it by moving the previous question.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I may exercise that power, but if the gentleman will allow the matter to take the usual course, I will not abuse the privileges of a Member of the House.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is not an abuse of the privilege of a Member of the House to move the previous question. That is simply the exercise of a right which the gentleman has.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I should like to ask some gentleman who is opposed to this bill—I prefer to ask my colleagues on the committee—if there is debate desired; and if so, about how much, to see if we can get consent to limit the debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois was just addressing the Chair.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman submitted a request to read the statement instead of the report.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Of course, that comes before the debate. Reserving the right to object, I wish to ask which report is referred to. I hold in my hand what purports to be a document, and also what purports to be a report; one I see, however, is a Senate document and the other a House document.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. If the gentleman will keep on studying, he will ultimately acquire some information about the procedure of the House.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I will by studying for myself, but not by information received from the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I have done my very best to enlighten him.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, still reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Missouri was proceeding to make some sort of a suggestion with reference to debate upon this question.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. If it is in order now, Mr. Speaker, I would ask if some gentleman will indicate how much time is wanted in debate, to see if we can agree upon it.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I expect to vote for the adoption of the conference report. I know of one or two gentlemen on this side who would like to be heard, one at least in opposition to the conference report, and I think if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] will state about how much time he desires, we can reach an agreement all around.

Mr. MANN. Let the Clerk read the statement, and in the meantime this can be arranged.

Mr. BARTLETT. When the statement is read, the gentleman can submit his request.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. We might as well settle this question now.

Mr. BARTLETT. Very well. So far as I am personally concerned, I should like to have about 10 minutes. Can we settle the question as to who shall control the time against the conference report? I do not care particularly to do it. I should think that 30 minutes on a side would be ample.

Mr. MANN. We want a little more than that. Make it 40.

Mr. OLMSTED. I suggest that we have 2 hours' debate, 40 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], 40 minutes by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], and 40 minutes by myself.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, there are but two sides to this question, and it seems to me that there is but one side.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is a biased view for anyone to take of it.

Mr. MANN. The request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] is a reasonable one.

Mr. OLMSTED. I will make that request, unless the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] will make it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be one hour of debate on this report [applause], one-half to be controlled by myself and one-half by some gentleman on the other side, if there is one who is opposed to it; and if not, by some one on this side.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, we can not agree to that; we are entitled to some time on this side of the House.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the statement be read instead of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. BARTLETT. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects, and the Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2958) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

"Every such candidate for nomination at any primary election or nominating convention, or for indorsement or election at any general or special election, or for election by the legislature of any State, shall, within 15 days after such primary election or nominating convention, and within 30 days after any such general or special election, and within 30 days after the day upon which the legislature shall have elected a Senator, file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives or with the Secretary of the Senate, as the case may be, a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent, from any source, in aid or support of his candidacy, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part; and such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value given, contributed, expended, used, or promised by such candidate, or by his agent, representative, or other person for and in his behalf with his knowledge and consent, up to, on, and after the day of such primary election, nominating convention, general or special election, or election by the legislature, together with the names of all those to whom any and all such gifts, contributions, payments, or promises were made for the purpose of procuring his nomination, indorsement, or election.

"Every such candidate shall include therein a statement of every promise or pledge made by him, or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent or to whom he has given authority to make any such promise or pledge, before the completion of any such primary election or nominating convention or general or special election or election by the legislature, relative to the appointment or recommendation for appointment of any person to any position of trust, honor, or profit, either in the county, State, or Nation, or in any political subdivision thereof, or in any private or corporate employment, for the purpose of procuring the support of such person or of any person in his candidacy, and if any such promise or pledge shall have been made the name or names, the address or addresses, and the occupation or occupations, of the person or persons to whom such promise or pledge shall have been made, shall be stated, together with a description of the position relating to which such promise or pledge has been made. In the event that no such promise or pledge has been made by such candidate, that fact shall be distinctly stated.

"No candidate for Representative in Congress or for Senator of the United States shall promise any office or position to any person, or to use his influence or to give his support to any person for any office or position for the purpose of procuring the support of such person, or of any person, in his candidacy; nor shall any candidate for Senator of the United States give, contribute, expend, use, or promise any money or thing of value to assist in procuring the nomination or election of any particular candidate for the legislature of the State in which he resides, but such candidate may, within the limitations and restrictions and subject to the requirements of this act, contribute to political committees having charge of the disbursement of campaign funds.

"No candidate for Representative in Congress or for Senator of the United States shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise, or cause to be given, contributed, expended, used, or promised, in procuring his nomination and election any sum, in the aggregate, in excess of the amount which he may lawfully give, contribute, expend, or promise under the laws of the State in which he resides: Provided, That no candidate for Representative in Congress shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise any sum, in the aggregate, exceeding $5,000 in any campaign for his nomination and election; and no candidate for Senator of the United States shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise any sum, in the aggregate, exceeding $10,000 in any campaign for his nomination and election: Provided further, That money expended by any such candidate to meet and discharge any assessment, fee, or charge made or levied upon candidates by the laws of the State in which he resides, or for his necessary personal expenses, incurred for himself alone, for travel and subsistence, stationery and postage, writing or printing (other than in newspapers) and distributing letters, circulars, and posters, and for telegraph and telephone service, shall not be regarded as an expenditure within the meaning of this section, and shall not be considered any part of the sum herein fixed as the limit of expense and need not be shown in the statements herein required to be filed.

"The statements herein required to be made and filed before the general election, or the election by the legislature at which such candidate seeks election, need not contain items of which publicity is given in a previous statement, but the statement required to be made and filed after said general election or election by the legislature shall, in addition to an itemized statement of all expenses not theretofore given publicity, contain a summary of all preceding statements.

"Any person, not then a candidate for Senator of the United States, who shall have given, contributed, expended, used, or promised any money or thing of value to aid or assist in the nomination or election of any particular member of the legislature of the State in which he resides shall, if he thereafter becomes a candidate for such office, or if he shall thereafter be elected to such office without becoming a candidate therefor, comply with all of the provisions of this section relating to candidates for such office, so far as the same may be applicable; and the statement herein required to be made, verified, and filed after such election shall contain a full, true, and itemized account of each and every gift, contribution, expenditure, and promise, whenever made, in anywise relating to the nomination or election of members of the legislature of said State, or in anywise connected with or pertaining to his nomination and election, of which publicity is not given in a previous statement.

"Every statement herein required shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the candidate, taken before an officer authorized to administer oaths under the laws of the State in which he is a candidate, and shall be sworn to or affirmed by the candidate in the district in which he is a candidate for Representative, or the State in which he is a candidate for Senator in the Congress of the United States: Provided, That if at the time of such primary election, nominating convention, general or special election, or election by the State legislature said candidate shall be in attendance upon either House of Congress as a Member thereof he may at his election verify such statements before any officer authorized to administer oaths in the District of Columbia: Provided further, That the depositing of any such statement in a regular post office, directed to the Clerk of the House of Representatives or to the Secretary of the Senate, as the case may be, duly stamped and registered, within the time required herein shall be deemed a sufficient filing of any such statement under any of the provisions of this act.

"This act shall not be construed to annul or vitiate the laws of any State, not directly in conflict herewith, relating to the nomination or election of candidates for the offices herein named, or to exempt any such candidate from complying with such State laws."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate amending the title of the bill and agree to the same with an amendment so that the title as amended will read as follows, viz:

"An act to amend an act entitled 'An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected' and extending the same to candidates for nomination and election to the offices of Representative and Senator in the Congress of the United States and limiting the amount of campaign expenses."

And the Senate agree to the same.

JOS. F. JOHNSTON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I desire to renew a request that I made a little while ago in a modified form. I ask unanimous consent that there may be 90 minutes debate, 30 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], 30 minutes by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], and 30 minutes by myself.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will not the gentleman make it 35 minutes?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I did intend to make it 35 minutes, but we have already consumed 10 minutes in reading the report.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will make it 35 minutes, that will give us time enough.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will modify my request and make it 35 minutes apiece.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the debate extend for 1 hour and 45 minutes, 35 minutes to be controlled by himself, 35 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], and 35 minutes by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a very brief statement. During the last session of Congress this House passed a publicity bill applying solely to the great political committees which operate in more than one State in connection with elections at which Members of Congress are elected. That bill required publicity of campaign contributions and expenditures both before and after elections. It went to the Senate in that form, was amended, and came back to us with all the provisions relating to publicity before election stricken from it.

The House disagreed to the Senate amendments, and the bill went to conference. In conference the House conferees found gentlemen representing another body obdurate, firm, and unyielding, and finally by a majority vote the conferees on the part of the House yielded and recommended to the House that it recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments and accept the same. As one of the conferees I refused to join in the conference report or statement. When the conferees report was up for action by the House I made a brief statement, giving my reasons for refusing to agree to the action of my associates, but declaring my purpose to vote for the bill, crippled and disabled as it was, realizing that I would have opportunity in the near future in another Congress to introduce a bill to right the wrong which I thought was then being perpetrated and to further urge the enactment of a law which would respond to the just demand of millions of good people.

When this Congress convened I did introduce a bill providing for the amendment of existing law by restoring the section requiring publicity before election, which the Senate struck out in the last Congress. That bill passed the House unamended, some amendments proposed by gentlemen on the other side being voted down. In the Senate the House bill was amended by the addition of a new section requiring publicity of expenditures by candidates for Representative and Senator in Congress, and applying to nominations as well as to election. Mr. Speaker, this Senate amendment was a surprise to me, and I think a surprise to every Member of the House and to the country, but in my deliberate judgment was a greater surprise to the distinguished gentlemen who constitute another body than to any other persons on earth, and I feel warranted in expressing the opinion that it never would have been agreed to in the Senate if gentlemen there had not confidently relied upon the House to oppose and strike it out.

But, in writing this amendment into the House bill, the Senate responded to the well-considered and almost unanimous sentiment and judgment of the people of the United States. And having sent so good a measure here, a measure which so fully responds to a righteous public opinion, a Democratic House immediately determined to accept it.

As frankly stated by me at the time, the conference on the Senate amendments was requested for the sole purpose of revising and perfecting the Senate amendments. With the able assistance of my good friend, Mr. CONRY, of New York, who has been very loyal and efficient in helping to perfect this legislation and in securing this conference report, and the assistance of my genial, nonpartisan friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], we have brought the measure back to the House perfected and amended in conference, and I think very materially improved. The provisions of the Senate amendments have all been carefully preserved; no principle has been eliminated from the amendments; the bill has not been weakened in any respect, but has been broadened and strengthened in many respects.

The principle of publicity—full, complete publicity both before and after election—is secured and we have inspired and breathed into this legislation life, vigor, and efficiency. This law will reflect the will and win the approval of people throughout the United States, regardless of political affiliation, who desire to purify elections and to restore and preserve inviolate the sanctity of the ballot box. I exceedingly regret, Mr. Speaker, that there is not an entire unanimity of sentiment on this side of the House in favor of the adoption of the conference report. This measure, so righteous in itself, so just in its provisions, so universally demanded, ought, it seems to me, to command the cordial support of every Member. But there are gentlemen who can not give it support, and in this preliminary statement I desire to say that with those gentlemen I have no quarrel. I realize the conditions that surround them, and I shall not question the judgment or challenge the vote of any gentleman who differs from me or put in issue the merits of the apprehensions which impel him to oppose this legislation.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. A brief question.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I find in the original bill as amended by the Senate the words "and consent" connected with his knowledge regarding the receipt of money. The conference report would apparently insert the words "and consent." Does the bill as it appears before us now include the words "and consent"?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. It does. Mr. Speaker, I was saying, and I repeat, I have no quarrel with gentlemen on this side of the House who differ with me. I recognize their devotion to public will and their unwavering devotion to the great undying principles of democracy. I know they will discharge their duty on this and on all occasions as they see it. I must be permitted to say, however, that I do not believe the apprehension of the danger they fear from Federal interference in matters belonging solely to the States is a reasonable apprehension, or that it is justified by the history of the past or by conditions existing to-day.

Mr. Speaker, only a few words more. I trust I may be pardoned for calling attention to the fact that one of the most valuable features of this bill was written into it by the distinguished junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. Recently chosen by a direct vote of the people of his State to serve them in that high office, he had the courage to proclaim in the Senate of the United States that no candidate for Representative or for Senator of the United States should spend more than a reasonable sum, to be fixed by law.

By his matchless eloquence he convinced that great legislative body that we should not only require publicity of all campaign expenses, but that we should fix a definite and positive limit to expenditures, beyond which it would be unlawful to go. The amendment offered by Senator REED, and accepted by the Senate, prescribes a maximum limit of $5,000 which may lawfully be expended by candidates for Representative and $10,000 by candidates for the United States Senate. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I say to you this is the best feature of this entire law; and while I concur in the judgment of some of my friends that the limit with reference to Members is too high—much too high—because I believe $5,000 is more than any candidate for membership in this House ought to be permitted to expend, yet I insist that even a high limit is preferable to no limit. If it should ever be charged and shown that I have spent in excess of $700 to secure my nomination and election, then I confess I would be unworthy to sit upon this floor [applause on the Democratic side], because the law of the sovereign State in which I reside requires me to subscribe to an oath that I have not spent a sum greater than that, and I will not violate the law of my State. I seek to win the votes of the people in my district, not by corrupting the masses but by doing the will of the splendid people whom I am proud to represent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I heard the gentleman give the history of this bill. Did the gentleman forget to mention the fact that the gentleman brought this bill, particularly relative to the primary feature of it, before the Democratic caucus, and they did not vote on it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have not forgotten any fact connected with the history of this bill, but the statement just made by the gentleman is not accurate, as he must remember when I call attention to the fact.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If I am not correct about it, I will be glad to be informed.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I think I have informed you, but I will inform you again.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then kindly inform me.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. A gentleman who represents neither Missouri nor Alabama, but the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN], who is here to speak for himself, circulated the petition for a caucus. I said to every man to whom I spoke that I had no intention or desire to tie the hands of any free man by caucus action on this bill, and in the Democratic caucus neither the gentleman who called the caucus nor those who indorsed his action dared to present the matter because of the fact——

Mr. RICHARDSON. But the gentleman will remember there was considerable opposition to this bill——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The gentleman can make a speech in his own time; now, let me proceed to make mine. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman must not put me in the attitude of having called a caucus on this bill, because he must know I did not. The fact is I never knew of it until I got official notice of the call. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] greatly magnifies the strength of the opposition to this legislation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was going to ask you if you did not make an explanation of that feature before the Democratic caucus, and the Democratic caucus manifested a great deal of opposition to it, and it was withdrawn?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The gentleman from Alabama indulges too much in pure imagination. Mr. Speaker, let me say that I wish I could meet my responsibilities under my oath and at the same time could free the minds of some gentlemen of the horrible nightmare this bill has caused them, but I can not do it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You never encountered that "nightmare," and that is the reason you do not understand it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I wish to assure my friend of the devotion I have for the land from which he comes. My kindred all sprung from that region, as the gentleman knows, and every sentiment of my nature is entwined around the institutions of the South, but the South is only one part of this country. It is the South, thank God, a glorious South, but we are legislating to-day for a glorious country, composed of the North, the South, the East, and the West—a united country—and the people demand publicity in every State and in every district. [Applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I deny here that the South or any State in the South is undertaking to shelter itself or escape publicity under any circumstances or conditions.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I have not so charged.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have heard you make that insinuation before.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I have made no such insinuation. The gentleman is too sensitive.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; I am not sensitive—not in the least.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I think you are too sensitive. I will not debate this question with him further, as I fear the gentleman is growing too sensitive.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is one way a man has of attacking another. I am not in the least sensitive. It is an acknowledgment of your inability to answer.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. What in the world troubles the gentleman from Alabama? I have answered him. The trouble is he proceeds on an erroneous assumption of fact and will not listen to reason. I have no objection to the conclusion he reaches. He is entitled to his opinion, however wrong it may be.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will say this to the gentleman from Missouri: That if there is any bill that ought to have been submitted to a Democratic caucus since this special session began, it is this bill.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I say this: That, in my humble judgment, and from my position here on the floor of this House, if there is any bill that has been before the extra session of Congress that ought to have gone to a Democratic caucus, it is this bill.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in answer to that I will say to the gentleman for the last time that this bill was discussed before the caucus, and I believe the caucus was called on his request, not mine, and in that caucus I told the gentlemen who called the caucus, "If you want caucus action, for the Lord's sake get it." I will not try to tie anybody.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Did you ask for it when you made that long speech before the Democratic caucus?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I did not want any caucus action, and hence asked for none. I went there to see what you were going to do. Mr. Speaker, in view of the interruptions I am having, if the Chair will kindly tell me how much time I have used, I will yield the floor, as I see I can not proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 23 minutes remaining.

Mr. HOWARD rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD]?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I do.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri his opinion of one clause of the bill. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri, in his opinion, what would be the effect of this saving clause that you have in this bill? For instance, in the State of Georgia suppose you could not spend under the law of Georgia over $500 in a campaign for Congress, while this bill says you can spend up to $5,000; would this law be paramount to the law of the State?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will answer the gentleman by saying that in the State of Missouri, where I live, the State law prohibits my spending over $700, and I will consider the State law as absolutely binding upon me, and not this law. I do not believe that this law will ever be construed to annul or vitiate any law of the States not directly in conflict with this.

Mr. HOWARD. Just a question further. In the gentleman's opinion, does the gentleman think that this $5,000 clause in this bill, as proposed by his committee, is not in direct conflict with the clauses of the laws in other States?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Certainly not, because the bill expressly provides that the law of the State shall prevail and govern, provided only that the total expenses shall not exceed the limit here fixed. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I represent a State which has, and has had for years, most wholesome, efficacious, and strict laws upon the subject of publicity of campaign expenses. These laws require every candidate, from constable to Congressman, to file in the office of the clerk of the court and to publish in every county where he is a candidate an itemized statement of the expenses that he has incurred in an election, and to swear from what sources the money comes—by whom paid; and they also require him to swear that he has not employed a hired worker at the polls or at any time during his candidacy; that he has not directly or indirectly conveyed or had conveyed to the polls any voter in a buggy or in a wagon or carriage or automobile; and these laws apply to primary and general elections alike. My State has, under the sovereign power that was reserved to it when this Government was formed, never yielded to the General Government the exercise of its police powers, but has always exercised that power. She has spread upon her statute books wholesome laws in regard to the election of every officer by the people, whether in the primary or the real election. We are not afraid in Georgia that we can not vote the Democratic ticket and keep that State steadfast, as it has been for 45 years, in the Democratic column unless we pass this bill and thus prevent the Republicans from buying the election; nor have we any fears that the Republicans will buy us. [Laughter on the Republican side.] That may be a fear peculiar to my friend from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER]. But we would not have any such fear, even if we did not have the protection to be afforded by this bill. It takes no law of Congress or the exercise of any drastic Federal power, the unlawful use of the State's police power, concentrated in the Federal Government, to keep corrupt people from buying an election in the State of Georgia. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri says this part of the bill which I particularly object to is his peculiar hobby; at least he said so the other day on the floor of this House; application of the provisions of this bill to primary elections was his peculiar hobby. The gentleman never mounted that hobby or rode upon it or even rocked it until he saw "this pillar of cloud by day and this column of fire by night" that has arisen over in the Senate in the person of the immaculate junior Senator from Missouri. [Laughter and applause.] "Paul may plant and Apollos may water," but not a vote can the junior Senator from Missouri get from this House or from the gentleman from Missouri from that district until a new light arose at night and the pillar of cloud by day spread itself over his entranced vision. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Speaker, why do I say so? Why, in this House, early in April, some vicious Republicans and the unthinking Democrats voted for and engrafted on his bill this identical proposition—that the Congress of the United States could go into Missouri and prevent the voters there from being bought in the primary elections. [Laughter.] What did the gentleman from Missouri do? In his wrath and indignation he moved that the bill be recommitted with instructions, and that the amendment placed in the bill by the vicious Republicans and the misguided Democrats should be stricken out: and all the power of the organization of the House, including the whip of the House and Democratic officials and the influences which he could set to work, were invoked by the gentleman, and at his instance the House voted promptly to strike the obnoxious amendment from the bill; and all the Democrats but two voted to strike it out, and the gentleman and the entire Democratic side applauded the result. The gentleman from Missouri, who, with his soul enthused with the idea of preventing the people of this country from being bought by Republican money, was so anxious to ride his hobby and to stride through the Halls of Congress on it, never mounted that hobby—on the contrary, he hamstrung it all he could—until he saw the junior Senator from Missouri, this new leader from the West [laughter]——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BARTLETT. I regret I have not time. I do not want to be discourteous at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BARTLETT. Not until this new giant, this Missouri Lochinvar, came out of the West, with spear leveled and helmet down, bestriding the gentleman's hobby; and then the gentleman climbed on behind. [Laughter.] It occurs to me to suggest that Shakespeare, had he lived in this age and could he have seen the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] in this performance, might have said of him what he said of "Bottom." You remember in that play when Bottom dressed himself to perform before his associates, they looked at him and said, "Bottom, how thou hast been transformed." And now, when the gentleman from Missouri came back from the conference, arrayed in all this new-found paraphernalia, clothed almost with the mantle of the new Senator from Missouri, it occurs to me that his coconferees must have raised their hands in admiration and said, "O Bottom, Bottom RUCKER, how thou hast been transformed." [Laughter.] What change has come o'er the spirit of his dreams. Manfully and gallantly he led the hosts of Democracy against the solid phalanx of Republicans and a few straying, rebellious Democrats in this House, but could not stand even one punch of the wooden spear of this new champion, the junior Senator from Missouri. [Laughter.]

I do not ascribe improper motives to anyone, much less to my friend from Missouri. I take it for granted that not only has a great light shone upon him outwardly, but that like Saul of Tarsus it came down like the noonday splendor and pierced his very soul and blinded him. I take it for granted and I accept it. I question no man's motives. But I stand here today in defense of that splendid system of Government which our forefathers formed, cemented with their blood, wrested from England, and builded upon solid foundations, and whose spire that points up to heaven, around which I trust the lightnings of eternity shall play, whose sides no beating storm from without shall shake, and no inward dissension shall ever tear down. [Applause.] Regardless of the new dogma from Missouri, promulgated by the new knight from out the West; regardless of the changed views and vigorous assault made upon my position by my friend from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], I shall still proclaim my devotion to that instrument, which does not give to Congress the power to exercise police authority in the States. [Applause.] Whence comes the power, even in a State, to regulate the primaries? Lest my views may be misconstrued, Mr. Speaker, I want to state right here and now that I am willing to have the fullest publicity of campaign expenses, in every election, including primaries. I am willing that the law shall prescribe the fullest publicity. I will even bow to the opinion of the majority of the court in the Siebold case and the other cases, which held that in regulating a congressional election the Congress had the power to do certain things; but I stop there, and I say no flood of power, however high its waves may dash against the adamantine foundations of this Constitution of ours, no fanaticism—I beg pardon for using the word, but that is the suitable word—no clamor from uplift magazines, or any other influence shall force me from the position that this Congress has no power to invade my State, usurp its police power, and destroy or regulate in the slightest degree its primary elections. [Applause.]

I say that as a lawyer; and as a lawyer I demand to know from any lawyer here whence comes the power from the State even to regulate primaries? From its police power. If I am not correct, I ask my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], for whose legal learning and information I have great respect, to correct me. The police power of the State regulates its primaries. There is where you get the power. That is the law laid down in the decisions, and I have read many of them in the past few weeks. What police power vests in the Congress of the United States, outside of the right to exercise it in the District of Columbia, in the Territories, and in those other places where the Congress has exclusive jurisdiction? None whatever; and the Supreme Court of the United States has often and without dissent decided that Congress has no police power within the several States. Does any man who is familiar with the law, who has read the decisions of the highest court in the land, claim that the Congress of the United States has any police power in a State? I pause long enough for some one either to show his knowledge or his ignorance.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. While the gentleman is pausing, let me ask him a question.

Mr. BARTLETT. On that subject, yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. No; on another subject.

Mr. BARTLETT. On that subject. The gentleman can not answer the question.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I think I can.

Mr. BARTLETT. Answer it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will answer it in my own time and to my entire satisfaction.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman from Missouri is easily satisfied. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Perhaps not to the gentleman's satisfaction.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, the gentleman might. But I am sure that when the gentleman speaks to himself he will have a distinguished orator and an appreciative audience both at the same time and in the same person. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, that being true, what power has Congress to invade my State and throw any safeguards around the ballot box at the primary? We never had any charge that a primary or any election was bought in Georgia, and I think, as a general thing, that the States south of the Potomac River have escaped that charge, with rare exceptions. But in order to safeguard and to protect our elections from any possibility of wrong, we have surrounded them with all of these safeguards. The law of the State of Georgia is better than this law. If you pass this act with reference to the primary and concede the power of the General Government to enact a law, is it not exclusive? If Congress has the power to exercise the authority to enact this law, it has the authority to negative the law of the States and permit them to be ignored. The laws of Congress are the supreme law of the land. If it has the power at all to exercise authority so as to regulate the primary, it has the right to make those regulations the supreme law of the land. Thus by this act you destroy all the other safeguards provided by our State laws. My State does not prescribe the limit of expenditure, but it does say that you shall publish an itemized statement of all sums expended. This bill provides that the expenses for stamps, stationery, and clerk hire shall not be included in the $5,000, the limit placed by the bill on expenditures. In a recent primary canvass in my district the items for stationery, clerical hire, and personal expense, published as required by law in my State, were the chief expenses incurred. So if this law passes in Georgia I can spend $2,000 in traveling expenses, stationery, clerk hire, and stamps, and spend $5,000 additional in hauling men to the polls and in surrounding the ballot box with heelers, and have men riding over the district working for me. You strike down the wholesome law of Georgia and erect in its place a sham, a pretext, a law of whose unconstitutionality, as far as I am concerned, I have not the slightest doubt, in which opinion many able lawyers of this House concur.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri said they had now reported from the conference "a bill full of life, full of vigor, and full of efficiency." Does the gentleman from Missouri mean to say that he led the House into the passage and adoption of a bill which had no life in it, which was a mere "dry bones," a mere skeleton, and transmitted it to this other body—the Senate—where this new man in the Senate touched it with his finger and made it spring up into a living being? [Applause.]

My friend has been here for 12 or 14 years, and I hope he will stay here as long as he wants to, but I will not accept his own characterization of himself that he in this House sent to the Senate a bill without life, without vigor, and without efficiency; and when this new man in public life, this new Senatorial magician, just lately inducted into the Senate from Missouri, laid on his hand and breathed into its nostrils and made it stand up, a full-blown body, full of life and full of vigor.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I think, if the gentleman wants to be accurate, he would not quote me in that way.

Mr. BARTLETT. I wrote it down at the time the gentleman said it. The gentleman said "We have brought back a bill full of life, full of vigor, and full of efficiency."

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes; that is so; but the gentleman said that I said it was no account when it went to the Senate.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not say it was of no account; I said that the gentleman transmitted a bill to the Senate which he now says is full of life and vigor and efficiency because it took the act of the new Senator from Missouri to make it full of life and vigor and efficiency. That is what I said. I know that the gentleman from Missouri is effective in dealing in metaphor, and he has some poetry to apply to every sentence in his speech. I just attribute that to a poetical license and the extent of his enthusiasm. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I could say a great deal about this bill. It is because I believe in local self-government, it is because I believe in the Constitution, it is because I believe in the right of the sovereign power of the States to exercise the police power of those States and not transferring it to the Federal Government, it is because I have lived in an age and an era where they had a Federal election law—and I know the horror and the misery and the infamy of that period, which will last long after the infamous authors are dead and justly forgotten, except for their infamy—that I will vote against this bill to give to the Federal authorities the power to control elections in my State. I am not afraid of this little bit of a pretext of invading the rights of the States or of requiring a Member of Congress in a primary election to give an account of his expenses. If it stopped there, there might not be any great harm, but it is the admission that Congress has that power to so invade the province of the State. When you admit the power and say it is necessary to regulate the primary, tell me, Representatives, where is the reason, if you are going to regulate the primary, in a simple way of requiring an account of expenses, why you should not regulate as to who should vote in the primary or in a general election? And if you can regulate the primary and regulate the election with reference to the expenditures of money in the primary, why can you not say who shall vote and who shall not, and every other incident connected with the election of Congressmen?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Did not the gentleman vote for the amendments to the Hepburn bill and the interstate-commerce law?

Mr. BARTLETT. In what way?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Did not the gentleman vote for its passage.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did for some of the amendments.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. And did not that bill make it a crime for shippers to make contracts for rebate?

Mr. BARTLETT. Why, certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. And did not that give Federal jurisdiction both in the State of Georgia and in the State of Missouri?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; and any man who has a license to practice law, unless he has forgotten how, who does not know the distinction shows his ignorance by asking the question. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I consumed?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has used 24 minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, there are many more reasons that I could give why this bill should not pass. The bill turns over the control of the primaries in the States to the Federal Government and the trial for violations of the law to a Federal court. Thank God, you gentlemen of the North have never been cursed with Federal judges like we have, and Federal courts that have been a simple horror to our people in the years past and gone. But, Mr. Speaker, I must give time to those who are more able to discuss this question than I. I am going to conclude by saying, so convinced am I of the correctness of my position on this proposition that Congress has no power to regulate the primary elections of my State, nor power to invade it and strike down those wholesome laws and enact new laws not half so efficient and wholesome—so convinced am I that no such idea ever entered the minds or the hearts of the men who builded the Constitution, but that it was left solely for our friend from Missouri and his new Senator to erect his new "pillar of cloud by day" and enlighten the world by his new "pillar of fire by night," and lead us poor benighted men who have been wandering in the wilderness to a new Canaan—that I will not and can not give my vote to this bill, even though all the press of the country in certain regions are clamoring for it, even though all the uplift magazines demand it, and even though my friend from Missouri has changed his position—I will not say his opinions—upon it and become the very transformed, translated "Bottom" of the Congress; even though all these things come all at once and all together to induce me not to preserve my devotion to the Constitution of the United States, the rights of my people, and the rights of my State, I shall stand here, though I stand alone, and resist the passage of this bill in my feeble way, and to them all I say, come one, come all, the very earth shall fall from its accustomed orbit sooner than I! [Applause.]

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I wish at the outset to acknowledge the faithfulness and loyalty with which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] kept in conference the promise which he made to the House when he asked for a conference. [Applause.]

Now, just a few words with reference to this bill. In the last Republican Congress—in 1910—we passed a campaign-publicity bill. This Democratic Congress had barely assembled when there was brought in here with a great flourish of trumpets another bill, supplementary to the first, and which we were told was to carry out Democratic campaign promises and platform pledges. Upon investigation that bill appeared to accomplish very little. It applied only to committees conducting elections in two or more States. It did not apply to individual candidates. It did not require returns by individual candidates of their expenses either at the primaries or at the general election. When the proposition was offered in this House to amend so as to make it apply to individual candidates and to extend its provisions to the primaries it was voted down by very nearly a party vote, our Democratic friends on the other side of the Chamber voting against it and the Republicans solidly voting for it. The bill went over to the Senate, and there it was amended so as to become a real publicity bill; in fact, a publicity bill plus. As amended by the Senate the bill applied not only to campaign committees, but to individual candidates; and not only to candidates for the House, but also for candidates for the office of Senator of the United States. It applied not only to the general election, but as well to the primaries and to nominating conventions and to elections by the legislature. It goes further and fixes a limit to campaign expenses.

The last Democratic national platform called particularly for the fixing of a limit upon campaign expenses, but the bill as it originally passed this Democratic House omitted all reference to that subject. The Senate amendment put it in. The bill came back to this House and the Senate amendments were all disagreed to. A conference between the two Houses was asked for and agreed to. I had the honor to be one of the managers on the part of the House in that conference. The report of the conference retains substantially all the Senate amendments, with some modifications making them more effective and more certain of operation. The question now is, Will the House agree to the conference report? The bill as agreed to in conference fixes the limit of $5,000 upon the expenses which any candidate may incur in securing his nomination and election to the House of Representatives. In the case of candidates for the Senate of the United States the limit is $10,000. I was in favor of scaling the limit of expenses according to the number of votes cast at the last preceding election, so that in smaller States or smaller districts the expenses allowed would not be so great as in the larger ones, something like the corrupt-practices act in England; but I was not the sole conferee, and did not have my way entirely.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. OLMSTED. For just a moment.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman, of course, recognizes that the exercise of this power is under the following provision of the Constitution:

The times, places——

Mr. OLMSTED. I do not care to have that read in my time. I am quite familiar with that provision of the Constitution.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, I wanted to ask the gentleman if he is familiar with the provision to which I have referred?

Mr. OLMSTED. I am familiar with it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to ask the gentleman whether he does not think that word "elections" in that section of the Constitution refers to an election fixed by the Federal statute rather than by any party agreement——

Mr. OLMSTED. I will answer the gentleman in a moment. I well understand that there is considerable objection from certain States where by "grandfather clauses" and by other means the Republican vote has been so nearly eliminated that the whole contest comes at the primary. There is in those States great objection to the operation of this proposed law.

Now, I will answer right here the question that the gentleman from Georgia has asked. The Constitution, in section 4 of the first article, confers upon the legislatures of the States, in the first instance, the right to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, but makes that power in the States subject to the authority of Congress to make or alter those regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators. The word "election," if my friend will run down the word to its final signification, he will find means "choice." Where the choice is really determined at the primaries it is in substance as much an election as if it occurred in November. The primary election in such a case decides the election. It fixes and determines the choice.

Mr. HARDWICK. Can the gentleman cite us to some of these decisions to which he has so glibly referred?

Mr. OLMSTED. I have not referred to decisions.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman said that if we would run it down it would be found to be so held.

Mr. OLMSTED. I can not allow my limited time to be taken up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. OLMSTED. Upon that side of the House gentlemen from districts where there is no contest in November, where it all occurs at the primary, have been along with the rest clamoring for publicity. But they seem to want it only in spots—in Republican spots.

Now, if we are to have a publicity bill at all, we want a publicity bill that applies to the whole country—North, South, East, and West—wherever a Congressman or a Senator is to be elected. [Applause.]

Let me show you how it works. I have known a gentleman, an able, distinguished, genial, and worthy gentleman, to occupy the position of minority leader on this floor in three Congresses. His district had a population of more than 200,000. He received less than 1,500 votes at the general election, but there having been no votes against him, he was triumphantly elected. There was no contest at the general election, and, of course, no expenses to report. A publicity bill that did not apply to the primaries would not afford any publicity of the actual expenses in a district like that.

According to the Congressional Directory for the present session, in the eight districts in the State of Mississippi there was not a Republican vote recorded for Congress. In one district in Alabama—the eighth district—the present honorable Member reports that he received 8,785 votes. The Republican candidate received 6 votes. But even that is better than it was in Mississippi, where they say that a man having the temerity to run for Congress on the Republican ticket and receiving 2 votes was arrested as a repeater. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. I will yield for one question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is the district I have the honor to represent on this floor.

Mr. OLMSTED. I am glad you have six good Republicans in it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am not in the least ashamed of it, and I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania here, not putting myself forward too much, that since my election to Congress I never have been in either a convention or primary election in that district. The honor has always been given me by my people by giving notice for three months that if anybody wants to run against me to do so, and if there was no other candidate I was declared the nominee of the Democratic Party. If the gentleman only was acquainted with the circumstances he would fully understand why the Republican received only 6 votes.

Mr. OLMSTED. I am not finding any fault with the gentleman or his district. I am glad that it does itself the honor to send so good and able a gentleman to Congress. [Applause.]

Now, in the third district I find that in the Sixtieth Congress the Member was elected without opposition, receiving 2,306 votes. The population of his district was 186,346.

The Member from the sixth district, having a population of 211,000, received 3,030 votes.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is my district. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. I can not yield my time. I am not finding any fault with the gentlemen nor their districts.

Mr. BARTLETT. Do I understand the gentleman declines?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] is out of order.

Mr. OLMSTED. I would be glad to yield if I had the time. In one district of that State the gentleman elected received the magnificent total of 1,743 votes, the district having a population of 181,395.

I will insert here, without reading, a statement showing the districts in Mississippi, Mr. Speaker, with the population and the votes cast for Members of Congress:

Districts.	Population.	Votes.
First	187,739	2,563
Second	183,795	2,567
Third	232,174	1,540
Fourth	199,650	2,536
Fifth	183,066	2,782
Sixth	162,440	4,077
Seventh	211,521	1,933
Eighth	190,885	(1)

[1] Not given.

In the sixth district there were 173 votes recorded for a Socialist candidate, but in the whole eight districts not a single Republican vote was recorded.

Mr. BARTLETT. What has that got to do with campaign contributions?

Mr. OLMSTED. I am going to show what it has to do with them. A very distinguished gentleman, then and now holding a place on this floor from the fourth district of Georgia, reported in the Sixtieth Congress—they do not report the votes now—the votes he received not at the general election but—at the Democratic primary, in which the real contest occurs, and which is, therefore, the only election in which the people take much interest.

I am stating these facts not in a fault-finding way but merely to show what the gentleman from Alabama so frankly admitted, that in many districts the real contest takes place at the primaries and not at the general election. That is why we are in favor of having the publicity law apply to the primaries. Why should not the expenses of "the real contest" be given publicity in those States where it occurs at the primaries as well as in those States where it occurs at the general election?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. OLMSTED. For one question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Your purpose is to investigate why there are not more votes cast?

Mr. OLMSTED. Not at all. It is simply to require publicity of nomination and election expenses.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; to inquire into it.

Mr. OLMSTED. This bill makes no provision for any inquiry at all, except as to the amount of expenses of nomination and election in every State and in every district.

There is another matter which may well be considered here. We passed recently through this House joint resolution No. 39, providing for the election of Senators by the people. This pending bill provides that whether elected by the legislature or by the people, every candidate for the Senate must report his expenses. This bill, if passed, will be passed in pursuance of authority contained in the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, conferring upon Congress the power to regulate the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators as well as Representatives.

In the resolution providing for an amendment to the Constitution so as to provide for the election of Senators by the people, you attempted to modify also the fourth clause, which gives to Congress the power of regulation. The Bristow amendment, agreed to by the Senate, retained the power of regulation in Congress. When that amendment came over here every Democrat voted to disagree, so that is now in conference. That Bristow amendment would restore the resolution, so as to leave in Congress, in case the Constitution should be amended, the power to regulate senatorial and representative elections.

I admit frankly that our Democratic friends, who voted to take away from Congress entirely the power to regulate these elections, are in an awkward position. They have been shouting for a publicity law; but if they vote for this bill they ought at once to move to recede from the disagreement of the House to the Bristow amendment, and let that resolution pass at once, so that the direct election of Senators by the people may be no longer delayed by the presence in it of that obnoxious provision which would prevent Congress from passing any publicity bill at all or in any other way regulating elections. You have been clamoring in campaigns and in campaign platforms for publicity. Now we offer you publicity—Republican publicity—an ocean of publicity. Do not stand shivering on the shore. In the language of the small boy at the happiest period of his life, we say to you, "Come on in; the water is fine." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against this conference report regardless of the action of others. The Democrats have long endeavored to secure publicity of campaign expenses in order to prevent or minimize the corruption notorious in our national elections, perpetrated by the contributions of special interests to the campaign funds of the Republican Party. Heretofore Republican ascendancy has defeated our efforts. All we could secure was publication after the election instead of before—locking the stable door after the horse was stolen. Early in the present Congress we passed a bill in the House, wisely devised and drawn, to publish before election in time to checkmate corrupt efforts and defeat their purpose.

That bill fully met the emergency. It laid bare the contributions to national campaign committees for the purpose of corrupting congressional and presidential elections. From different motives, foolish ones on the part of the Democrats, carried away with wild fads, and sinister ones on the part of Republicans who wish by implication to legalize the expenditure of money by candidates, amendments were placed on the bill in the Senate, some of them exceedingly foolish, some of them exceedingly vicious, and all of them inimical to the purpose of the House bill. The 10-cent statesmanship feature, so utterly ridiculous and insulting to the intelligence of American voters, has wisely been abandoned.

The authorization by implication that candidates for Congress may spend $5,000 outside their personal expenses and candidates for the Senate may spend $10,000 outside their personal expenses is a crime against purity, honest politics, and civilization. The proviso that the candidate's personal expenses, traveling, hotel bills, postage, stationery, telegraph, and telephones should not be counted covered substantially the purposes for which a candidate ought to spend money. In honesty and in fact no candidate ought to be allowed to spend any money outside of his personal expenses as enumerated for the purpose of influencing his election. There is no honor in an election that is purchased in whole or in part. There is no profit in it if it takes all or a substantial part of the salary to pay for the election. A man who can afford to spend his salary, or a substantial portion thereof, and go to Congress anyhow, defraying his expenses from other sources, goes there for ulterior purposes, backed by interests which have ends to subserve, He is not there for the public good. He is there improperly, and legislation, if efficacious at all, should prohibit the expenditure of any money to purchase elections. Candidates for any office ought to be prohibited by law from spending a solitary cent to secure votes. When they pay their personal expenses and whatever they may be required to contribute to the expenses of holding the election in an open and legal manner they ought to be prohibited from spending anything else. But this is not the place for that legislation.

Every State ought to be decent enough to provide honest and efficient election laws. When the two Houses of Congress exercise their constitutional power to be the judges of the qualification and election of their own Members, they are armed with sufficient power to purify themselves and protect themselves against unworthy membership. They ought not to condescend to the usurpation and exercise of unnecessary powers to interefere with elections in the States. Federal interference with State elections has always been opposed by the Democratic Party. Aided by Federal courts, it is the one overshadowing menace to our liberties and to be fought at all points and resisted to the death.

The unconstitutional provision for the Federal Government to interfere with primary elections is not only obnoxious but monstrous. I will never vote for it. A State which is not competent to regulate that subject ought to ask the Federal Government to relieve it of further responsibility, and divide its territory among States that are able to do their duty. Right here I will anticipate any criticism that may be made on my position through repetition of the oft-repeated falsehood that this objection to interference in primary elections is peculiar to the South—an effort to protect and conceal the political misdeeds of the South.

There was never a more false and unjust aspersion concocted and published. The elections in the South are honest, free, and fair, under adequate State laws, providing publicity and all other requisites. Everybody votes who wants to, and his vote is counted. Representatives do not purchase their elections there, but enjoy their positions as Members here because they are elected by the free suffrage of the most enlightened, upright people in the world—the only true American and English constituency left solid in any State in this Union. With them remains the only true, reliable, and conservative guaranty for constitutional liberty; with them rests the hope of the defense of the principles of this Government and the perpetuity of our institutions. They pity the ills of the other States, and hope the other States may muster sufficient character and patriotism to deal with the questions. But they are not uneasy about this publicity law electing a single Republican Representative or Senator in any of the Southern districts or States now democratic.

These foolish provisions are put in for the purpose of carrying the large cities and the border States, where enough white people are wrong on politics to take the wrong side and support efforts to use the power of the Federal Government to interfere with elections in the States. The border States, where a great many of the white people are deluded into the support of the Republican Party, may be carried by the Republicans through the instrumentality of these provisions, and some of the larger cities, with their motley population unacquainted with the principles of a republican form of government and caring less for them, may be captured by the Republicans; but let no man hug to his bosom the vain delusion that anybody in the South is afraid of their gaining any Representative or Senator there.

Our doctrines are fundamental. Our principles are fixed and eternal. The citadel of our political virtue is impregnable. Faction and partisanship and Federal oppression have done their worst with us and have failed. We are now safe, but want to elect some Members and Senators in other States. We intend to remain pure and exercise a beneficent influence to help our sister States to purify themselves, and I decline to vote for any provision, either foolish or vicious, that would help subject them to further corruption instead of relieving and protecting them therefrom, as the original House bill provided. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, how does the distribution of time stand?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has 12 minutes, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] has 4 minutes, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] has 20 minutes.

Mr. OLMSTED. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe in this report, and I shall vote against it, with the idea of having another conference. As the bill went from the House to the Senate it was a publicity bill. The character of the legislation has been transformed by amendments which were made, some of them improvised on the floor of the Senate, from that of a publicity bill to that of a corrupt-practices act. One of the great pieces of legislation in England is their corrupt-practices act. I believe we should have one in the United States, but I do not believe in passing an act of this important character that is ill-considered, that has never been before any standing committee of this House, and one in which the Representatives of the House upon the conference have not even had an opportunity to give us well-thought and well-considered provisions.

I have great confidence in the gentlemen who represent the House upon the conference committee. The gentleman from Missouri and his associate upon that side of the House [Mr. CONRY] are very able lawyers, and there has been no better lawyer in this House during my term of service than the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED]. I believe that the thing to do, for those of us who want a well-thought and well-considered corrupt-practices act, is to vote down this conference report, ask for a further conference, and let these gentlemen during the coming recess give it that care, thought, and labor which its importance demands, and bring in a report in December worthy of the country.

For that reason I propose to vote against this report, and not because I do not favor legislation of this character. When I was a member of the Massachusetts House of Representatives I introduced the first bill in the nature of a corrupt-practices act that ever passed any legislative body in this country. I introduced the publicity bill that became a law in the last Congress, and if we are to have further legislation along these lines I feel a deep interest in having it carefully drawn, and not to have the slipshod and the sloppy and incomplete provisions that are contained in this bill.

In the first place, this bill assumes to restrict the amount of money that a Member of Congress may use, and it fixes that amount at $5,000. In my whole 10 campaigns I have not spent $5,000. There is practically no restriction to that. Then they exempt traveling expenses, stationery, and postage, the circulars that a man may send out in his primary campaign, and the same items when he is up for final election. There may easily be spent under those items three or four or even five thousand dollars more. That leaves so large a sum as to amount to no practical limitation upon the amount that may be spent.

But I am more opposed to this bill because it makes it necessary for every candidate for Congress, whether he is elected or defeated, and for every candidate for the Senate to make an affidavit upon subjects that are not clearly defined, so that he may know what is required of him. If one is called upon to make oath to certain things in a highly penal statute, he should be told just the points that he is to cover. If you will carefully read the provision here with regard to the oath of a candidate, it is indefinite. It may be construed by one man one way, so as to include certain expenses, and by another man so as to exclude those expenses, and no candidate can be sure just what he is to cover in his return.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MCCALL. I should like a couple of minutes more.

Mr. OLMSTED. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, I will not have opportunity, in the limited time left me, to call attention minutely to parts of this law, but you will find that the provision with regard to the filing of returns by the candidates does not state where those returns are to be filed. It leaves it merely a matter of inference. As to the return itself, there is the following provision:

> Such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value given, contributed, expended, used, or promised by such candidate, or by his agent, representative, or other person for and in his behalf with his knowledge and consent, together with the names of all those to whom any and all such gifts, contributions, payments, or promises were made for the purpose of procuring his nomination or election.

Now, it is very easy for a candidate to make an affidavit as to contributions or promises of money or things of value made by him or by his authorized agent, but how can he tell what is done by any other person? But, you say, it must be with his knowledge and consent. Now, what does that mean? A candidate goes to a place in his district where a meeting is called by the city or town committee. He has nothing to do with it except that he is asked to speak there, but the meeting is in the interest of his candidacy and perhaps in the interests of the State ticket. He consents to that meeting. He has knowledge of it. It is not clear that it would not be incumbent on him to go to the authors of that meeting to find out what they pay for the band, what they pay for the hall, and include that in his account. I do not believe that was intended, but it should be definite. You have altogether too many loosely defined penal statutes. You can find other matters in this bill that are not clear, and your conscientious candidate may feel compelled to make an extreme return in order to include everything that is doubtful, and the candidate who wishes to avoid the law will take to himself the benefit of the doubt.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] has 13 minutes remaining, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] 4 minutes, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] 12 minutes.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS].

Mr. BARTLETT. And I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Louisiana.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for 6 minutes.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, in the limited time allowed me I can not more than skim the surface or touch in high places this great question. I can only outline. I wish to say when this conference report was made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] I reserved all points of order, expecting that I would have an opportunity to fully and freely discuss thet question now before the House. My object in doing so was to put myself on record in a proper light with reference to two leading propositions contained in this measure. One was the contribution of campaign expenses in general elections. The other was as to the contribution of campaign expenses in primary elections. There is a vast difference in the issues involved in these two propositions. When this bill was before the House, I voted against the amendment which purposed having the law apply to primary elections, but voted for the bill, which provided that the law should apply alone to general elections. My opinion has not been changed by the fact that an amendment has been incorporated in the bill by the Senate by which the law is made to apply to primaries.

For six years the gentleman from Missouri, who has charge of this measure, has been an ardent advocate of the proposition to require the publicity of campaign expenses in general elections, but in no instance during that time has he ever advocated the publication of campaign expenses in primary elections until this bill came back from the Senate with the amendment tacked upon it.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], who has just preceded me, who has been looked upon as the father of the proposition to require the publication of campaign expenses, has never advocated or proposed anything of this kind and does not favor the bill in its present form at this time.

The Democratic Members of the House of Representatives are put in this attitude: We have staring us in the face a Democratic platform, a plank of which demands the publication of campaign expenses, but which does not require or contemplate the publication in primary elections. Hon. William J. Bryan addressed a message to the President of the United States, then Secretary of War, demanding the publication of campaign expenses and requesting him to join with him in procuring the passage of a bill by Congress for that purpose, but gave no intimation that it should apply to primary elections. Why, in all the agitation in and out of Congress, in the magazines, and elsewhere, has it not been urged that Congress should make the law apply to primary elections? It is because of the embargo placed upon legislation of this kind by the Constitution of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are confronted with this contingency: Here is a demand made by the Democratic convention for the publicity of campaign expenses. Here is a provision of the Constitution of the United States which prevents the Federal authorities from infringing upon the rights reserved to the States. When the Constitution of the United States was framed the States then in existence were already fully organized. They had their own laws, which were interpreted by their own judicial tribunals, and they surrendered only certain rights and prerogatives to the Federal Government through the Constitution. All rights not especially surrendered were reserved to and remain inherent in the States. Amendment IX reads:

The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

Amendment 10 reads:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

The courts of the States have the sole province and exclusive jurisdiction of interpreting the laws of the States. This broad proposition is submitted: There is a national law providing for the election of Members of Congress. The Constitution and acts of Congress provide for that; providing the number, age, residence, when they shall be elected, and even that the Members of the House of Representatives shall be voted for on written or printed ballots or by voting machines. There is no Federal primary election law. The States of the Union alone have primary election laws, which laws have been enacted by the legislatures of the various States having these laws. If the amendment tacked onto this bill by the Senate is incorporated into this law, the Federal judges will have jurisdiction of the cases arising under the law and will have the right to interpret the primary election laws of the various States, which will be a clear infringement upon the rights of the States and will be in violation of the tenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Believing that this measure will pass the House, and being paired and prevented from voting upon the question as now presented, I avail myself of the opportunity of expressing my views, trusting to the future for vindication of what I believe to be a usurpation of the rights reserved to the people of the States by the express terms of the Constitution.

For years I have worked and voted for a law providing for the publicity of campaign expenses in general elections, as demanded by the national Democratic platform, which was intended to correct the evil of vast sums of money being used by the national campaign committees in corrupting the electorate and controlling national elections, and I would hail with delight an opportunity at this time to vote for such a law. When the bill was returned to this House in its present form I requested that we be allowed to vote separately on the two propositions, but this could not be permitted under the rules of the House, and we are forced to accept or reject the report as it comes from conference as a whole. For the purpose of showing the Democratic view, that the evil practices sought to be stopped related to national elections and not to local elections or primaries, I herewith incorporate as a part of my remarks the demands of the Democratic Party, culled from the Democratic Campaign Book, page 221:

We demand Federal legislation, forever terminating the partnership which has existed between corporations of the country and the Republican Party under the expressed or implied agreement that in return for the contributions of great sums of money wherewith to purchase elections they should be allowed to continue substantially unmolested in their efforts to encroach upon the rights of the people.

Any reasonable doubt as to the existence of this relation has been dispelled by the sworn testimony of witnesses examined in the insurance investigation in New York and the open admission of a single individual—unchallenged by the Republican national committee—that he himself, at the personal request of the then Republican candidate for the Presidency, raised a quarter of a million dollars to be used in a single State during the closing hours of the campaign.

In order that this practice shall be stopped for all time, we demand the passing of a statute punishing by imprisonment any officer of a corporation who shall either contribute on behalf of or consent to the contribution by a corporation of any money or thing of value to be used in furthering the election of a President or Vice President of the United States or any Member of the Congress thereof. We denounce the Republican Party, having control of the Federal Government, for its failure to pass the bill introduced in the last Congress to compel the publication of the names of contributors and the amounts contributed toward campaign funds, and point to the evidence of the insincerity of Republican leaders when they sought, by an absolutely irrelevant and impossible amendment, to defeat the passage of the bill as a further evidence of their intention to conduct their campaign in the coming contest with vast sums of money wrested from favor-seeking corporations. We call attention to the fact that the recent Republican national convention at Chicago refused when the issue was presented to it to declare against such practices.

We pledge the Democratic Party to the enactment of a law prohibiting any corporation from contributing to a campaign fund and any individual from contributing an amount above a reasonable maximum, and providing for the publication before election of all such contributions above a reasonable minimum. (Democratic platform.)

Also from the Democratic campaign book, page 145, the following telegraphic correspondence explains itself:

LINCOLN, NEBR., May 25, 1908.

Secretary WM. H. TAFT,
Washington, D. C.:

I beg to suggest that as leading candidates in our respective parties we join in asking Congress to pass a bill requiring publication of campaign contributions prior to election; if you think best, we can ask other candidates to unite with us in the request.

W. J. BRYAN.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 26, 1908.

Hon. WM. J. BRYAN,
Lincoln, Nebr.:

Your telegram received. On April 30 last I sent the following letter to Senator Burrows, the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate:

"My Dear Mr. Burrows: I sincerely believe that it would greatly tend to the absence of corruption in politics if the expenditures for nominations and elections of all candidates and all contributions received and expenditures made by political committees could be made public, both in respect to State and national politics. For that reason I am strongly in favor of the passage of the bill which is now pending in the Senate and House, bringing about this result so far as national politics are concerned. I marked this letter "personal" because I am anxious to avoid assuming an attitude in the campaign which it is quite possible I shall never have the right to assume, but so far as my personal influence is concerned, I am anxious to give it for the passage of the bill.

"Very sincerely, yours, WM. H. TAFT."

Since writing the above, in answer to inquiry, I have said publicly that I hope such a bill would pass.

WM. H. TAFT.

LINCOLN, NEBR., May 26, 1908.

Hon. WM. H. TAFT, Secretary of War,
Washington, D. C.:

Am very much gratified to receive your telegram, and trust that the publication of your letter will add the weight necessary to turn the scales in favor of the measure. Elections are public affairs, and publicity will help purify politics.

W. J. BRYAN.

LINCOLN, NEBR., May 26, 1908.

Senator CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Please secure copies of my telegrams to Secretary Taft and his reply concerning campaign contributions. His letter to Senator Burrows may enable you to secure action on the bill.

W. J. BRYAN.

LINCOLN, NEBR., May 26, 1908.

Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Please secure copies of my telegram to Secretary Taft and his reply concerning campaign contributions. His letter to Senator Burrows may enable you to secure action on the bill.

W. J. BRYAN.

But the Republican Congress failed to enact a publicity law.

Mr. Burrows did not press it upon Congress, nor did he, as temporary chairman, call it to the attention of the Republican national convention. The convention by a vote of 94 yeas to 880 nays voted down the publicity plank.

The following is an extract from the Senate Documents, volume 4, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session:

The abuses arising from the secret political contributions has brought about a demand that the sources and objects of campaign contributions and expenditures should at least be revealed to public scrutiny, in order that their regulation and correction, if deemed necessary, should be made with the fullest knowledge of the actual conditions and evils involved.

Following the lead taken by New York in 1890, 17 States have passed measures securing in some degree the publicity of campaign funds. In the closing days of the presidential campaign of 1904 the question of campaign contributions had been made an issue of almost paramount interest. The governors of many States had urged that legislation should be adopted upon this subject. Public opinion demanded that campaign money should be regarded as public money.

On the subject of campaign contributions Senator Gray wrote:

Corrupt-practices acts have been largely unavailing and seemingly incapable of being enforced. Compelled publicity as to contributions and campaign expenses will be more efficient than all of them put together toward suppressing the evil of electoral corruption. It will work automatically and require no legal machinery of pains and penalties to enforce it. I mean that when publicity is once enforced the beneficial results flow automatically, without the intervention of penal legislation.

STATE RIGHTS.

On the question of State rights I will incorporate in my remarks the presentation of this question by Dr. J. L. M. Curry, minister to Spain under President Cleveland, president of Howard College, and at the time of his death custodian of the Peabody fund:

The Union is not the primary social or political relation of those who formed it. The State governments were already organized and were adequate to all the purposes of their municipal concerns. The Federal Government was established only for such purposes as the State governments and the confederation could not sufficiently answer, namely, the common purpose of all the States. The people of the States not as a unit, not in the aggregation, but separately, hold in themselves all governmental power. One portion they granted to the State governments, another to the Government of the Union, and the residue they retained undelegated to themselves.

Mr. Jefferson deprecated "usurpation of the powers retained by the States, interpolations into the compact, and direct infractions of it," and as late as 1825 solemnly asserted that though a dissolution of the Union would be a great calamity, submission to a government of unlimited power would be a greater.

The powers reserved in the tenth amendment are not only reserved against the Federal Government in whole, but against each department, the judicial as well as the legislative and executive. Otherwise the Federal sphere is supreme and the spheres of the States subordinate. It can not be tolerated for a moment that the Supreme Court has the right to modify every power inhering in the State governments or undelegated to the people, so as to exempt its own action from their influence. The authors of the Federalist insisted that the apprehended inequality did not exist, and that should it be developed the States would be able to control. Hamilton wrote: "The General Government can have no temptation to absorb the local authorities left with the States. * * * It is, therefore, improbable that there could exist a disposition in the Federal councils to usurp the powers with which commerce, finance, negotiation, and war are connected. Should wantonness, lust of domination, beget such a disposition, the sense of the people of the several States would control the indulgence of so extravagant an appetite."

Those who contend most strenuously for the rights of the States and for a strict construction of the Constitution are the genuine lovers and friends of the Union. Their principles conserve law, good order, justice, established authority; and their unselfish purpose has been to preserve and transmit our free institutions as they came from the fathers, sincerely believing that their course and doctrines were necessary to preserve for them and posterity the blessings of good government. The States have no motive to encroach on the Federal Government and no power to do so, if so inclined, while the Federal Government has always the inclination and always the means to go beyond what has been granted to it.

Also Loring's commentary on the argument of Daniel Webster:

As the United States Government's sovereignty is undoubtedly limited to the express grants of the Constitution, the powers not granted are in the States or people. There was no need of any reservation, except to allay the fears of those who erroneously believed that the Constitution gave unlimited power to the Union.

Again, Dr. Curry, in discussing the ninth and tenth amendments, says:

The ninth amendment prohibits a construction by which the rights retained by the people shall be denied or disparaged by the enumeration; but the tenth, in language that tyranny can not pervert or dispute, "reserves to the States, respectively, or to the people the powers not delegated to the United States or prohibited to the States." Could any language more conclusively show the ultimate authority of the States or that the General Government has no more right to enforce its decisions against those of the several States where they disagree as to the extent of their respective powers than the latter have of enforcing their decisions in like cases? This reservation was incorporated from a caution deemed unnecessary and excessive by some, because such a reservation is of the very essence and structure of the Constitution, but it has been vindicated as a marked demonstration of the wisdom and sagacity of the fathers. Instead of receiving powers the States had bestowed them, and in confirmation of their original authority most carefully reserved every right they had not relinquished. The powers reserved by those who possessed them, the distinct people of each State, are those not delegated or prohibited, and were intended to remove suspicion of a tendency in the Constitution toward consolidation which had been vigorously charged by some of those who had opposed the ratification. It can not be reiterated too often that the people do not derive their rights from the Government. In England, Magna Charta and other franchises were granted by Kings and residuary rights remain in and with the Government, the ungranted rights remain with the Government; here, ungranted rights remain with the grantors and these are the people of the States.

TUCKER ON THE CONSTITUTION.

I also quote from John Randolph Tucker:

The Federal Government has no powers but those delegated by the Constitution. It has no inherent powers, but only those derived from the Constitution as expressly delegated or granted by necessary implication. Those not so delegated, unless prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people. Reservation of powers is the basis of the title of the States or of the people of the States to political powers under the Constitution. They are not secured to the States or to the people of the States by virtue of the Constitution. They are inherent in the people of the States, and unless delegated to the United States, or by their constitutional act prohibited to themselves, they remain with the States respectively and the people.

In the case of the United States against Cruikshank, Chief Justice Waite uses this emphatic language:

The Government of the United States is one of delegated powers alone. Its authority is defined and limited by the Constitution. All powers not granted to it by that instrument are reserved to the States or to the people.

In Martin against Hunter, Judge Story, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

It is perfectly clear that the sovereign powers vested in the State governments by their respective constitutions remain unaltered and unimpaired, except so far as they were granted to the Government of the United States. * * * The Government, then, of the United States can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given or given by necessary implication.

Hamilton, in the Federalist, says:

The rule that all authorities, of which the States are not explicitly divested in favor of the Union, remain with them in full vigor * * * is clearly admitted by the whole tenor of the instrument.

Mr. Speaker, on May 22, 1908, the House of Representatives had under consideration the McCall publicity bill, providing for the publicity of campaign expenses, to which there had been attached an amendment providing for the publicity applying to primary elections.

Mr. CRUMPACKER, of Indiana, who has almost invariably advocated those measures inimical to the interests of the South, stated:

The amendments go beyond the old election's law sections to which I have referred by including primary elections, and I have no kind of doubt that Congress has authority to regulate and control primary elections held under State and Territorial laws where they are called for the purpose of nominating candidates for Congress and Delegates thereto.

To this speech the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], who now has charge of the measure before the House, replied. He said:

We on this side—

Meaning the Democratic side—will not dodge the issue. We earnestly favor publicity of campaign contributions, but we are unalterably opposed to force bills and Federal supervision of elections.

Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, the minority leader, in his speech in that debate upon the question, said:

You know that nobody who believes in American institutions would vote for section 11 of the Crumpacker bill. It puts the execution of State laws in the hands of the Congress and the courts of the United States.

You know that nobody would vote for section 12 of that bill, which does the same thing and which prescribes a Federal punishment for a violation of State laws.

The vote was taken on the bill as amended. One hundred and sixty-one Republicans voted in the affirmative, including the Speaker [Mr. CANNON]; 126 Democrats voted against it.

It was this measure to which reference is had in the Democratic national platform in which the statement is made—

The insincerity of the Republican leaders when they sought by an absolutely irrelevant and impossible amendment to defeat the passage of the bill.

Thus, by the Democratic Party, in the national convention assembled, is this very effort to infringe upon the sacred rights reserved to the States and to the people thereof repudiated and denounced.

When the bill which is now under consideration was up for passage in the House only a few days ago, the Democrats of the House indignantly refused to accept an amendment allowing the provisions of this act to apply to primary elections. It was finally passed by the House of Representatives after the amendment relating to primaries had been eliminated. No one more vigorously opposed the amendment than the gentleman from Missouri who has charge of the bill. The bill went to the Senate by the votes and with the approval of the Democratic Members of this House, and after they had most emphatically refused to enact the measure into law with the provision incorporating the primary feature. But, lo, the Senate reinstated the provision requiring that the law apply to the primary-election laws of the various States. Now, we behold the anomaly of those who had worked and voted against the measure, and had declaimed against it, advocating it.

When the Republicans were in the majority, we denounced their efforts to force this measure upon us. But now, when the Democrats are in the majority, it seems inconceivable that a fundamental Democratic principle should be trampled underfoot. When this bill which we now have under consideration was before this House on April 14, 1911, in charge of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], who is now presenting it to this House, an amendment was offered to make primary elections in which Members of Congress should be elected amenable to its features.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed. His motion was carried upon his statement that he opposed the measure in its present form—meaning with the amendment thereto applying to primaries. He stated that he was not only opposed to it in that form, but added, "So is every other man who wants publicity." The question was put by the Speaker—

Shall the bill be recommitted with instructions to have section 2 stricken out?

This was the section applying to primary elections. The question, being put, was carried by 157 yeas to 149 nays—the Democrats in the affirmative and the Republicans in the negative. On the same day the chairman of the committee reported the bill back to the House with section 2, relating to primaries, ordered to be stricken out. The amendment was again voted on, and section 2, referring to primary elections, was stricken out by a vote of 165 yeas to 139 nays, the Democrats again voting against the provision in favor of having publicity apply to primary elections, even the Democratic Speaker asking that his name should be called, so that he could be placed on record as opposed to the publicity law applying to primary elections. After the primary-election feature had been eliminated the bill was passed by a vote of 307 yeas and not a single vote against it, even the Republicans putting themselves on record with the Democrats in favor of carrying out the demands of the Democratic Party for the publicity of campaign expenses in general elections. The Democrats had thus time and again put themselves on record at this session of Congress—as they had done heretofore—as opposed to the violation of the rights of the States by allowing the Federal authorities to invade the sacred precincts of the States and take from the State courts the right to interpret the laws of the States.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Not many years ago the people of the Southern States had an experience with Federal interference with the local affairs, and the horrors of reconstruction still strike consternation in the hearts of those who experienced that fearful ordeal. There is no disposition on the part of any loyal citizen of this great Union to again fight over the battles which divided the two sections of this Union; but the fearful experiences of those troublesome times which tried men's souls will serve as an illustration of the danger of again allowing any infringement upon the rights reserved to the States. Only a few illustrations culled from the official records will suffice.

LOUISIANA.

Henry Clay Warmoth was the first Republican governor of Louisiana during the reconstruction times, when the laws of the States were either suspended or made subservient to the Federal authorities. He was an adventurer, having no interest in the welfare of the State. He had been a Democrat in Illinois; had gone from there to Missouri, where he enlisted in the Federal Army. He escaped charges preferred against him in the Army, also, after the war, in Texas, from which State he went to Louisiana. He there entered politics as a Republican. He first ran for Delegate to Congress from Louisiana, the negro voters being required to deposit 50 cents each with their ballots to defray his expenses. He was subsequently declared elected governor of Louisiana. His salary was $8,000 per annum. The first year he was governor he made over $100,000, and when his term expired and he retired to private life his wealth was estimated at $1,000,000. The tax collector in New Orleans, appointed by him, received $60,000 per annum. The above facts are taken from House Report No. 92, Forty-second Congress, second session, page 24 (investigating committee).

Illiterate negroes filled the various offices in the State, sat on juries, made laws to plunder the people, taxation being synonymous with confiscation.

CARPETBAG RULE IN LOUISIANA.

William Pitt Kellogg was the second Republican governor of Louisiana.

The conviction has been general among the whites since 1872 that the Kellogg government was a usurpation. This conviction among them has been strengthened by the acts of the Kellogg legislation, abolishing existing courts and judges and substituting others, presided over by judges appointed by Kellogg, having extraordinary and exclusive jurisdiction over political questions by changes in the law centralizing in the governor every form of political control, including the suspension of elections by continuing the returning board with absolute power over the returns of elections; by the extraordinary provisions enacted for the trial of titles and claims to office; by the conversion of the police force, maintained at the expense of the city of New Orleans, into an armed brigade of the State Militia, subject to the command of the governor. * * *

With this conviction is a general want of confidence in the integrity of the existing State and local officials * * * which is accompanied by the paralization of business and destruction of values. The securities of the State have fallen in two years from 70 or 80 to 25; of the city of New Orleans from 80 or 90 to 30 or 40; while the fall in bank shares, railroad shares, city and other corporate companies have in a degree corresponded. Throughout the rural districts of the State the negroes reared in habits of reliance upon their masters for support, and in a community in which the members are always ready to divide the necessaries of life with each other, not regarding such action as very evil, and having immunity from punishment from the nature of the local officials, have come to filching and stealing fruit, vegetables, and poultry so generally * * * that the raising of these articles had to be entirely abandoned, to the great distress of the white people.

The taxation has been carried almost to the point of confiscation. In New Orleans the assessors are paid a commission on the amount appraised, and the houses and stores can be had there for the taxes. In Natchitoches Parish the taxation reached about 8 per cent of the assessed value of the property. In many parishes all the white Republicans and all the officeholders belong to the same family.

The Kellogg government claims to have reduced taxation. This has been effected in part by establishing a board to fund the debt of the State at 60 per cent of its face value. This measure aroused great hostility, not so much on account of the reduction of its acknowledged debt as because it gave the funding board * * * discretionary authority to admit to be funded some $6,000,000 of debt alleged to be fraudulent. So that under the guise of reducing the acknowledged debt it gave opportunity to swell the fraudulent debt against the State. (H. Rept. No. 101, 43d Cong., 2d sess., p. 6.)

SOUTH CAROLINA—HIGH PRICE FOR A GOVERNOR.

COLUMBIA, S. C., October 16, 1877.

Personally appeared F. J. Moses, who, on oath, deposes and says: When, as governor, I approved the large printing bill for the Republican Printing Co., during the session of 1872–73, I received from Mr. Woodruff the sum of $15,000, I think. The money was paid in a check drawn by Le Grand Benedict in favor of Hardy Solomon, and the sum of money was turned over to Messrs. Seibels & Ezell as the first payment on the purchase of the Preston mansion.

Report on Public Frauds in South Carolina, page 317:

Moses was speaker of the house from 1868 to 1872 and governor from 1872 to 1874. Besides this bribe, he testified that he received, when speaker, $25,000 at one time and $15,000 at another, besides smaller sums and "divisions." He was a scalawag. (1873.)

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT,
Thursday, July 2, 1874.

Saw Wright. He wanted me to raise him $2,500, and said he would give me the decision by 6 o'clock, if I would get that amount for him. He suggested that I try ex-Gov. Scott, but he was no go. Scott said he did not want the mandamus unless it could be used for legislative expenses, as well as for Frazee, Rose, and the printing company, and went back and told Judge Wright so. Wright asked me to telegraph for Jones, and I did so; but failed to bring him. Very much troubled about mandamus. (Report on Public Frauds in South Carolina, p. 296.)

Extracts from diary of Woodruff, clerk of the State senate:

Judge Wright was a Massachusetts negro. Except in Arkansas, Louisiana, and South Carolina, the supreme courts were fairly decent bodies. (1874.)

A NEGRO LEGISLATURE.

In place of the old aristocratic society stands the rude form of the most ignorant democracy that mankind ever saw invested with the functions of government. It is the dregs of the population, habilitated in the robes of their intelligent predecessors, and asserting over them the rule of ignorance and corruption. * * * It is barbarism overwhelming civilization by physical force. * * * We will enter the house of representatives. Here sit 124 members. Of these 23 are white men, representing the remains of the old civilization. These are good substantial citizens. * * * There they sit, grim and silent. They feel themselves to be but loose stones thrown in to partially obstruct the current they are powerless to resist. This dense negro crowd * * * do the debating, the squabbling, the lawmaking, and create all the clamor and disorder of the body. These 23 white men are but observers, the enforced auditors of the dull and clumsy imitation of a deliberative body, whose appearance in their present capacity is at once a wonder and a shame to modern civilization.

The speaker is black, the clerk is black, the doorkeepers are black, the little pages are black, the chairman of the ways and means is black, and the chaplain coal black. At some of the desks sit colored men whose types would be hard to find outside of Congo, whose costumes, visages, attitudes, and expressions only befit the forecastle of a buccaneer. (A "liberal" Republican's description of the South Carolina Legislature of 1871. From Pike, Prostrate State, p. 12 et seq.)

KEEPING MONEY IN THE STATE.

Afterwards I saw (Senator) Leslie in one of these rooms and he handed me a smaller package, about the shape of a brick, which I took and carried home, and on examination found that it contained about $5,000 in money. I will not be positive, but I think the sum of $30,000 was to be distributed among members of the senate committee on finance, and there was some feeling afterwards about some rumors that Owens and Whittemore had got more than other senators * * *. I have one of the Blue Ridge scrip now for $5,000 which was given me in connection with these matters, in addition to the $5,000 testified above. I was supporting these bills because I thought, after hearing arguments of these men, that it was right, and merely took the money because I thought I might as well have it and invest it here as for them to carry it off out of the State. (Report of public frauds in South Carolina, p. 640. Statement of W. Beverly Nash, a negro leader. 1872.)

WHAT ARE YOU WILLING TO PAY?

I went to Tim Hurley, negro, and told him the circumstance; that this man wanted to get a charter for his mine; that it would bring into the State $160,000 or $170,000 of cash immediately, and would help our people a great deal. He looked at me and said, "What is it worth?" I said, "It has not been tried yet, but we hope to make it profitable." He burst into a laugh, and said, "You are green; I mean what are you willing to pay to get the thing through?" I said, "I am not willing to pay anything. You are legislating for our people; this is for the benefit of the people, and we demand our rights at your hands." The bill was not passed that week, and I returned to Columbia on some business afterwards and met this man, who said, "There is no other way than to pay this thing through, and I have made arrangements to do it; if you will go to the legislature to-morrow you will see the difference between your arrangements and what I have made." (Ku Klux report, South Carolina testimony, p. 178. Statement of counsel for manufacturers.)

THE REPUBLICAN RULE IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

That certificates for legislative expenses have been made to cover vast frauds no man will dispute. They are universally regarded as the last culminating evidence of a prevailing system of corruption which has disgraced our State and offended the nation. (Veto of bonanza bill, Mar. 17, 1875.)

A very large number of the members of the South Carolina Legislature come to the capital for the purpose of selling their votes and making all they can out of the office. (Interview, May 24, 1875.)

The last six sessions up to the time I was inaugurated cost the State, under the head of legislative expenses, the enormous sum of $2,147,430.97. These figures, I may say, are unparalleled in the history of American legislation. It is stealing, pure and simple. (Interview, May 24, 1875.)

The duties of a trial justice here are precisely the same as the duties of justice of peace in other States, yet previous governors had appointed and commissioned over 200 men to the important duties of this office who could not write nor read a word of the English language. It was a farce and a fraud; for how can men thus ignorant intelligently try cases, civil or criminal, brought before them? (Interview, May 24, 1875.)

What a travesty it is to see men filling the office of school commissioner, to pass on the qualifications of school teachers, when they can barely write their names. (Speech, Feb. 2, 1876.)

Extracts from Gov. Chamberlain's statements published in the Charleston News and Courier, September 20, 1876. He was then candidate on the Republican ticket for relection.

House Miscellaneous Document No. 31, part 1, Forty-fourth Congress, second session.

SOME LEGISLATIVE EXPENSES.

Copies of receipted bills in the South Carolina treasury show that $200,000 was spent for furniture, only $17,000 of which went to furnish the statehouse. The investigating committee in 1877 printed about 1,200 pages of similar bills, and this was only a fraction of the material there. No attempt was made in South Carolina to disguise the frauds. (Report of public frauds in South Carolina.)

COUNTY OFFICERS IN MISSISSIPPI.

The Ames Republicans (in Mississippi) have unscrupulously used the ignorance and greed of the negroes to help them in their political schemes. Controlling the negro vote and using it as a solid mass, they have put into such offices as the county supervisors and treasurers, as well as into the legislature, negroes who were often not only unable to read and write, but who were notoriously corrupt and corrupting demagogues. For instance, the late treasurer of Hinds County, in which the State capital lies, was a negro who could neither read or write, and who was killed a few weeks ago by another negro for a disgraceful intrigue. In the last legislature were several negroes who could neither read or write. It happened that the members of a grand jury were totally illiterate. A city government was to be elected last August in Vicksburg, and the Republicans nominated for mayor a white man at the time under indictment for 23 offenses, and for aldermen seven colored men, most of them of low character, and one white man, who could neither read nor write, the keeper of a low groggery. * * * Of the present supervisors of Warren County (Vicksburg) the president and two others can not read. It is a notorious fact that Gov. Ames has appointed to judicial places men ignorant of the law, and that he has used his appointing power to shield criminals who were his adherents and to corrupt the judiciary of the State. (Nordhoff, Cotton States, p. 75, 1875.)

TAXATION IN MISSISSIPPI.

In 1869 the State levy was 10 cents on the $100 on assessed value of lands. For the year 1871 it was four times as great; for the year 1872 it was eight and one-half times as great; for the year 1873 it was twelve and one-half times as great; for the year 1874 it was fourteen times as great as it was in 1869. The tax levy of 1874 was the largest State tax ever levied in Mississippi, and to-day the people are poorer than ever before. * * * A careful estimate shows that during those years of increasing and most extravagant tax levies the public debt was increased on an average annually over $664,000, a sum itself sufficient to defray the entire expenses of the government economically administered. (A protest from the Mississippi taxpayers' convention to the legislature, Dec. 2, 1874. Mississippi Elections, 1875, p. 457.)

Statement of Reuben Davis, formerly a Member of the United States Congress:

"You took $16,000 of my cotton and left me a beggar; I call that an act of oppression. You denied me the right to vote; I call that an act of oppression. You denied me right to hold office; I call that an act of oppression. You refused to permit our State to be represented in Congress; I call that an act of oppression. You sent men here to organize these colored people for political purposes and for your political good, and the men who came were the men your people in the North would scarcely recognize as gentlemen at home, and they robbed us; I call that oppression. I call it oppression not to throw a little flower upon the grave of a southern soldier, which we have never failed to do upon the graves of northern soldiers in the South since the war ended.

I call it a manifestation of bitterness toward us in the general legislation which has been imposed upon the South, and which was intended for the South alone, although * * * it was general on its face. But I have seen as many as four or five hundred men of my country taken before your Federal court, and when they got there the district attorney says: "Pay me the cost and I will dismiss the suit." We have been robbed of our substance that way; I call that oppression. (Mississippi Elections, 1875, p. 1077.)

ARKANSAS.

Arkansas has less than 650,000 people. It has about 120,000 voters. These owed in 1868, when reconstruction began in this State, about $3,500,000, and had $319,000 in cash in their treasury. The debt was State debt. The counties owed little or nothing. To-day, after seven years, the State owes at least $15,700,000, and most of the counties have debts of their own sufficient to make them bankrupt. And for this huge indebtedness, which amounts for State, counties, towns, and school districts, to probably $20,000,000, the people have nothing to show, except some miles of railroad. * * * The State debt alone amounts to more than $115 for every voter. State, county, township, and school debts, including scrip of all kinds, would probably bring the voters in debt $175 per head. * * *

In Little Rock the collector of taxes openly engaged in brokerage, took out a Federal license as a broker, and then drove a thriving trade with the citizens when they came to pay their taxes. You must understand that all State and county scrip was receivable at par for taxes. If a citizen had to pay $50 taxes, he might buy scrip at 30 cents and pay it in at par.

But the collector bought scrip beforehand, when the market was low, and made his own bargain with the citizens. It is said that he made his office worth $100,000 a year. His way was to demand a moiety of the tax, but in greenbacks. For this he gave a receipt in full. Then he kept the greenbacks and turned into the treasury the scrip he had bought up so cheaply. This atrocious form of swindling became so universal that I have been told that only one tax collector in the whole State has uniformly turned into the treasury the same money which he received, and this when the allowances of the assessors and collectors were so great that in some years it cost 20 per cent to collect the State revenue. (Nordhoff, The Cotton States, 1875, pp. 29–31, 1868–1875.)

NORTH CAROLINA.

The taxation for State purposes has increased fivefold under the new constitution. Our taxation for State purposes before the war used to be 10 cents on each $100 valuation of property (one-tenth of 1 per cent). We pay this year for State purposes 52 cents on each $100 of value—that is, the present levy for regular State purposes, in addition to the public debt, county expenses, etc. (Ku Klux Rept., North Carolina testimony, p. 313, 1871.)

ALABAMA.

In 1858 the total State tax of Madison County, Ala., from all sources was $23,417.63. In 1870 the total State tax of Madison County was not less than $65,000, made up as follows:

Tax on real estate	$51,445.30
Tax on personal property	8,471.75
Tax on licenses, polls, insurance, etc., estimated at	5,082.95

The estimate of taxes for polls, insurance, etc., is a low one, and the probability is that the aggregate will, in fact, fall but little below $70,000. The total State tax on land in Madison County in 1858 was $7,213.10; in 1870 it was $51,445.30, a difference of $44,232.20. In other words, the total tax paid on land in our county in 1870 was more than seven times what it was in 1858. And before the war we had over 13,000 slaves in the county, worth not less than $8,000,000—a sum fully equal to the value of all the taxable property in the county. My taxes last year, 1870, were three times as great as the year previous. (Ku Klux Rept., Alabama testimony, p. 461. Statement of P. M. Dox, northern man, Independent, 1871.)

BACON AND HAMS IN POLITICS IN ALABAMA, 1874.

These reports are by no means as complete as they should be, but by reference to them it will be seen that in the first congressional district M. G. Candee issued in Wilcox and Monroe Counties 24,902 pounds; G. V. Boynton, in Dallas County, 19,021 pounds; total, 43,923 pounds. In the second congressional district were distributed 41,949 pounds in the various counties; however, 7,239 pounds of this was reclaimed by the Government. In the third congressional district 20,000 pounds were distributed, but the Government afterwards recovered 12,182 pounds of this. Fifty-two thousand one hundred and thirty-five pounds were distributed in the fourth congressional district and 31,278 in the fifth district. (H. Rept. 262, 43d Cong., 2d sess., p. 1299. Report of Capt. W. T. Gentury, Nineteenth Infantry, United States Army.)

As to the use made of the Government bacon, Perrin (deputy United States marshal) testified:

I issued the bacon for Monroe County. Previous to doing so a report was circulated among the negroes that in order for them to obtain bacon they would have to vote the straight Republican ticket; and if they received bacon, and afterwards refused or neglected to vote the said Republican ticket, they would forfeit their rights in law. As I was a candidate for the legislature upon the said ticket, I did not consider it necessary to correct this report. * * * It was extensively stated that a barbecue would be held at Monroeville on election day, and that all negroes who would attend and vote the Republican ticket would receive bacon enough to last them a year. This induced many of them to come from adjoining counties and vote on said day. * * * At least 500 illegal votes were cast there for the Republican ticket.

Under pretense of relieving destitution caused by floods in Alabama, the radical Members of Congress from that State secured an appropriation from Congress. The appropriation was made in the spring; but the bacon was held until the fall election, and distributed in districts never flooded. (1874, Nordhoff, Cotton States, p. 88.)

FLORIDA—END OF CARPETBAG RULE IN FLORIDA.

The visiting statesmen returned to the North and the Florida lawyers began to set up for themselves. They filed in the Supreme Court a petition for a writ of mandamus, * * * asking that a board of State canvassers be compelled to reassemble and canvass the returns as sent up by the county boards of canvassers. The board, in their first answer, raised the question of the jurisdiction of the court. * * * A peremptory writ was issued, commanding the board to count the votes from the face of the returns. Of course, there was no answer to any such writ, but the conspirators undertook to trifle with the court, and filed the protest instead of executing its mandate.

The court then intimated clearly to the conspirators what they might expect if its mandate was not immediately obeyed. The conspirators, viewing the iron bars of the prison house in fear and trembling, with weeping eyes, returned and made the canvass. The second canvass gave Drew 195 majority over Stearns, and the Hayes electors 214 over Tilden. The board in this canvass threw out the returns from Clay County so as to save the Hays electors. * * * Gov. Stearns, looking back over the hard labor of his plundering career, and seeing that the packing of juries, the prostitution of public schools, the disfranchising of whole counties, mob conventions, planned irregularities in elections, the public money to get possesion of railroads, the wholesale stuffing of ballot boxes had availed nothing, still was loath to give up the government when he was actually in sight of the promised land. He called a consultation of the ring chiefs at the City Hotel and required to know of them whether they would support him should he maintain that he was governor, the decision of the Supreme Court to the contrary notwithstanding. With one voice, they all answered "Yea." Some of the carpetbaggers doubted the propriety of defying a Republican Supreme Court, but the "Little Giant" (L. G. Dennis) declared that if Stearns did not hold onto the government he would kill him. The day before Drew was to be inaugurated Stearns saw many strange faces in Tallahassee among the whites, and he began to grow pale and talk weak. The "Little Giant," now seeing that Stearns was about to yield up the ghost, went out and filled himself with the red beverage of hell and came to the hotel to murder him, and would have attempted to do so if he had not been locked in a room and detained until he fell asleep.

In the meantime the whites had made great preparation for the inauguration of Drew. Early next morning Drew and Stearns were seen coming out of a house together, as though they had been holding a long consultation. The whites were on hand from Georgia and from all parts of the State in large numbers, and the confiding freedmen came also to see the inauguration of Stearns. Drew seems to have made it all right with Stearns, or Stearns with Drew, and Stearns procured a team and drove into the country, while Drew was inaugurated. The whites had stationed in an old cotton storehouse close by the capitol between 300 and 500 men armed with repeating rifles, with the intention of slaughtering the men who might attempt to inaugurate the defeated candidate. Everything, however, passed off quietly, and the new governor was inaugurated amidst the shouts of thousands of glad-hearted people, both black and white, who boasted that their votes had done the work. Thus ended the eight years of carpetbag famine and pestilence. (Wallace, Carpetbag Rule in Florida, p. 342.)

Wallace supported Stearns and Hayes. Drew was Democratic candidate for governor, 1876. * * *

THE SOUTH WITH HER CIVIL RIGHTS RESTORED.

Mr. Speaker, if the time were propitious, I would like to turn from this horrible nightmare of only a few years ago, when our fields of the South were a barren waste, our homes made desolate, our manhood trampled under foot, and all save the sacred honor of our womanhood destroyed, to our present achievements; to detail at length the wonderful development in mining, manufacturing, and agricultural pursuits; but I will only take time to state in a general way that no land under the sun has made such rapid strides in material development as has the South within the last generation. Natural gas, oil, iron ore, coal, sulphur, salt, timber, and other natural resources abound in almost limitless quantities.

But the South is naturally an agricultural country, and, freed from oppressive taxation and tyrannical oppression, we are working out our own destiny, and are to-day a happy and contented people. Why molest us? Why throw in the "apple of discord" as we dance with glee to the harp of joy? I herewith submit for the earnest consideration of every lover of this great country of ours the statement of the Manufacturers' Record of the 17th instant, entitled "Developing the Nation's Greatest Asset":

What a marvelous story of vast expansion in manufactures and in agriculture, of transformation, of increasing wealth, is being unfolded as from day to day the census tells in cold statistics of the capital and products of the individual States of this country! The 16 Southern States covered by the work of the Manufacturers' Record now have more capital invested in manufacturing than the whole country had in 1880.

In 1880 the total capital invested in manufacturing in the United States was $2,790,000,000. These 16 States had $2,885,000,000 in manufacturing capital when the present census figures were compiled in 1909, and to this several hundred millions have since been added. This is a marvelous change. It should arrest every man's attention. In 1880 the United States was justly boasting of its vast industrial interests, of its development in manufacturing and agriculture, and yet these Southern States now have several hundred million more capital engaged in manufacturing operations than the entire country then had. With such an achievement despite hard conditions prevailing until recent years in the development of the industrial activities of the South, how limitless are the possibilities of this section as indicated by what has already been accomplished! In 1900 the value of the mineral products of the South was $131,700,000; in 1909 it was $327,421,000; and we have as yet scarcely begun to scratch the surface or even to discover the extent of the mineral wealth of the South. Southern prosperity, however, is not found in manufacturing and mining alone. The same great expansion is seen on every hand and in every line of activity. The addition of over $4,000,000,000 to the value of the farm properties of these States attests the progress of agriculture.

In 1900 the total value of the farms of the 16 Southern States included in this comparison was $3,233,000,000. In 1909 it was $7,298,000,000. During the same period the value of farm buildings, more strongly indicative of increasing prosperity than even the value of farm lands, rose from $855,000,000 to $1,672,000,000, strikingly illustrating the vast activities in the construction of dwellings and farm buildings generally during that 10-year period. What a wonderful change must have marked the life of the farmers of these 16 States as indicated by this increase of over $800,000,000 in the value of their farmhouses, what an advance in their financial strength, in their power to consume, their power to improve and produce, was made by the gain of $4,000,000,000 in the value of their farm property. This advance in farm lands and buildings finds its explanation in the increase in the value of the 12 leading crops of these States, which advanced from $916,000,000 in 1900 to $1,977,000,000 in 1909, a difference in the value of one year's output of over $1,000,000,000 as compared with the output of 10 years before.

Year after year from 1900 there was an ever-increasing value of southern farm products, the momentum continuing until, as stated, the value in 1909 of these 12 leading crops, which, of course, does not by any means express the full value of the output of all southern farm products, was $1,000,000,000 greater than in 1900. This difference of $1,000,000,000 in the value of these 12 crops in 1909 and 1900 was greater than the aggregate national banking capital of the United States at present, and it is going on from year to year.

Increasing productivity in agriculture and in manufactures has naturally led to an increase in foreign commerce through the southern ports. Ten years ago the combined value of the foreign exports and imports of the South figured up $536,000,000. For the last fiscal year the figures show a total of $896,000,000, a gain of $360,000,000 compared with 1900. The importance of the South as an asset in the Nation's commerce is indicated in the following facts:

1. During the last fiscal year 47 per cent of the total exports of the United States originated in the South.

2. During the same year 36.4 per cent passed through southern ports.

3. In that year the value of the exports from one southern port was twice as great as the total value of the combined exports from all the entire Pacific coast of the United States, and was $23,541,732 more than the combined values of exports and imports of the Pacific coast.

4. The value of the foreign exports from that one southern port exceeded by $38,389,552 the combined export trade of San Francisco, Boston, and Philadelphia.

In banking and in railroad operations the same wonderful increase is seen. These figures illuminate the whole story of the South's upbuilding. Intelligently studied, they give some conception of how great must have been the activity in the establishment of new factories, the purchase of equipment for mine and mill, for the construction of dwellings, the building of wharves and warehouses, and for all the other activities which go with such a vast expansion of business. They emphasize as nothing else can do what this period of expanding activity has meant in city building operations and the limitless work connected with the engineering problems of city life, the building of streets and roads and water works, the establishment of sewerage systems, electric light plants, and kindred enterprises.

Interesting, however, as these facts are as throwing light upon what has been accomplished, they are of infinitely more interest as illuminating the future. They show that the South, standing erect and triumphant, is ready to go forward with a momentum it has never known before, with its material upbuilding, backed with the vast force of accumulated money and, even more important, accumulated experience in manufacturing enterprises, in mining operations, and in agricultural pursuits.

Starting to-day with a manufacturing capital exceeding by $200,000,000 to $300,000,000 the total manufacturing capital of the United States in 1880, and with its agricultural output exceeding by over a half billion dollars the total value of the farm crops of the United States even as late as 1890, when the value of the latter was $2,460,000,000, against $2,975,000,000, as the present value of the farm products of these 16 Southern States, surely here is a condition which should create abounding optimism throughout the whole country about the South. It should stimulate the energies and activities of every man interested in the continued progress of this section. It indicates what will be achieved with this magnificent foundation on which to build. From these facts may be gained some idea of the wide ramifications of southern upbuilding in the future, how towns and cities will grow, how greater buildings for factories, for offices, for warehouses, for hotels, for schools, churches, and homes will be erected in ever-increasing numbers, how railroads must expand, terminal facilities be increased, agriculture be advanced, how good-roads work and street making will be pressed, and how everything that makes for the broadest activity of a richly endowed and rapidly growing country will move forward with redoubled energy by reason of achievements already made.

As "the development of the South means the enrichment of the Nation," facts such as these should be received with as much enthusiasm by every business man in the North and West and East as by the people of the South. This land of opportunity, this land of limitless possibilities, has achieved much. In the next 10 years it will achieve infinitely more. Every manufacturer, every banker, every investor, every business man of whatever kind in the whole country, is necessarily interested in such a story of the South's progress, for the South is the greatest asset of America, and its development will add enormously to the wealth and progress and power of the United States. In this re-creation of a country will be found limitless opportunities for the people of the South, as well as for the business people of other sections who want to share in the South's prosperity.

On August 4 there was released to the daily press the following statement by the Southern Commercial Congress, showing the increase of farming lands and buildings in the South within the last decade:

In 10 years, 1900 to 1910, the 16 States of the South have more than doubled in the value of farm lands and buildings. This valuation has increased from $4,077,291,000 to $8,964,782,000, a gain of $4,887,491,000. The average increase for the entire section is 125 per cent.

The table given below has been prepared by Clarence J. Owens, commissioner of agriculture of the Southern Commercial Congress, and is based on the reports of the Bureau of the Census.

The summary follows:

With the application of the principles of scientific agriculture, the marvelous increase in wealth indicated above, is but the beginning of a period of development that will make the South preeminent as an agricultural section. The South holds undisputed leadership in the greatest average annual rainfall and in the number of growing hours.

On August 7 the congress published the following statement, showing the increase in the value per acre of the farm lands in the South during the same period:

Farm land in the 16 States comprised in the territory of the Southern Commercial Congress has doubled in the average value per acre the past 10 years. The increase is from $9.60 in 1900 to $19.71 in 1910.

The bureau of agriculture of the Southern Commercial Congress has received authentic information that a financier from a distant State recently purchased 22,000 acres in North Carolina, at $3.40 an acre, and in a few weeks sold about 2,000 acres at an average of $40, leaving 20,000 acres profit.

The average value per acre in North Carolina is $15.29. The illustration gives conclusive evidence that there are some landholders in the South who know not the value of their property.

However, the people of the South are beginning to ascertain these values, and those living outside of the South are coming to a fuller understanding of the wealth, held by the section, in the variety and character of soils.

Since the reconstruction period, from 1880 to 1910, the population of the Southern States has increased from 18,260,716 to 32,415,297. During the same period the enrollment of the children in the schools has trebled. The expenditures for schools has increased from $7,133,000 in 1880 to $62,945,359 in 1908. The increase in bank deposits bear the same ratio; the same is true of her mining and manufacturing industries; her churches and everything else which tends to show the peace, prosperity, and happiness of a contented people. In the name of all that is sacred and holy to the lovers of freedom I most solemnly and vigorously protest against the enactment of any legislation which will tend to break down the bulwark of liberty guaranteed to the people of the States by the founders of this great and glorious Union of ours.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I will ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken or who may speak may extend their remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, why not permit any gentleman who desires to express his views upon this bill to extend his remarks in the RECORD for five legislative days?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from Louisiana will be granted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak have the right to extend their remarks, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] amends that by asking that all gentlemen have five days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD upon this bill.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection if the remarks are confined to the bill.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. On this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Under the circumstances, the question still being unsettled as to whether a man can write applause into a cold-storage speech, I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has 11 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Missouri 12 minutes remaining.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, I am unable to conceive of any reason why any Member of this House of either party should hesitate to give unqualified support to this measure.

It is asserted here in sort of ghostly aspirated tones, until my friends from Georgia were heard this afternoon, that the measure means the entrance of the country upon a new and untried policy of Federal supervision of elections. Be it so, Mr. Speaker. The people of the country, from all sections and from all parties, will welcome the innovation with open minds and hearts. For if there is within the reach of the Congress of the United States an Augean stable whose stench and putrefactions rend the high air of the heavens, it is what is known as the "money power" in national elections.

If this Congress—Democratic in one branch and Republican in the other—shall be the Hercules to let in the river of light and reason and cleanse the Nation from this mighty "pest," its services to the country can never be overestimated.

This bill comes to us simple in form and direct. It says to us, "Take this step forward, or remain where we are and suffer these wrongs to continue."

I have watched this bill somewhat closely from the beginning of the session, when it came here from the committee, with the sole intention of changing the time of filing publicity reports. I learned from current rumors that there was an understanding that it was best for the present Congress not to attempt going beyond the control of contributions and expenditures of election committees involving two or more States. This, in effect, meant its application to national committees only. I offered an amendment covering practically the same grounds as the Senate amendments now under consideration, mainly for the purpose of stating my views upon the publicity of campaign contributions. From my general reading I have come to hold the view that the expression of views in legislative bodies is not of much consequence unless an opportunity of voting upon them is afforded to the assembly.

I sought to gain no partisan or factional advantage. I heard Member after Member state that he favored the publicity which reached into the heart of all primary and general elections. It seemed to me then, and it seems to me now, that it were useless to provide for the publicity of campaign funds by committees and leave the individual candidate free to solicit and accept contributions from any source and use them to secure his election over his more honest opponent. If it were necessary to prohibit the purchase of the memberships by wholesale, it should be necessary to prohibit the purchase at retail.

The only effect of a law which permits the purchase of Members by retail and permits the purchase at wholesale would be to raise the price and not to prevent the traffic.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said that this law is an approach to a force bill, and that it is aimed at the primaries of the South. I deny this, Mr. Speaker, and in defense of the South I deny that the Southern States are more in need of campaign publicity acts than we of the North and West.

In my brief service in Congress I have had occasion several times to address this House in favor of Federal election laws; but I am not an extreme federalist; and I also deny that I am a vicious Republican, as voiced by those gentlemen from the South. The only trouble with my friend from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] is that the first Republicans he ever saw were vicious Republicans, and the youthful vision still lingers in his heart. I will go as far as any Member of this House in protecting our dual form of constitutional Government, and, therefore, the rights of the States in their appropriate and constitutional spheres.

As I grow older—I hope riper in judgment—I see more clearly the beauty and strength of that system of government, a system of which Webster said—> constituted a secret wholly unknown to the nations of the past, and the only known solution of the problem of maintaining order and at the same time preserving liberty.

But, Mr. Speaker, the integrity of elections to the National Congress is of nation-wide interest. It is the corner stone upon which our dual system rests. Upon these matters the will of the whole people must ever be wiser and freer from prejudice than that of any one community.

There is room enough in which to be jealous in the protection of the rights of the States in matters of purely local concern.

It has been my fortune as a State officer, in a humble way, to be thrown into the midst of somewhat notable battles over the preservation of these rights.

I have always believed that when the Federal courts of the land, for the purpose of extending their own jurisdiction, construed the words "persons within the jurisdiction of a State," in the fourteenth amendment, to include corporations domiciled in the State, and thereby going so far even as to sustain suits brought by a foreign stockholder against his own corporation, and permitting such stockholder resident in a distant State to join as codefendant with his own corporation in the Federal courts, the executive officers state that these courts laid violent hands on the Constitution and smothered the spirit of the eleventh amendment, which solemnly enacted and guaranteed to the people of the States that a sovereign State should not be held to answer in a court of law, except at the suit of another sovereign State or the Government itself.

As an humble member of an humble organization—the associated attorneys general of the States of the Union—we went to the last ditch with former Attorney General Young, of Minnesota, in support of this position.

I believe that the public sentiment created by this suit and by this and similar organizations resulted in action by the last Congress, which curtailed to some extent the power of the courts over State officers in suits involving railroad rates.

We tried out in our own State the right of the State to enforce its own local liquor statutes free from interference by the Federal courts in a pretended protection of interstate commerce. We had the same contest as to our health and stock-food laws.

We went through the entire series of Federal courts to the Supreme Court of the United States to establish the proposition that the State had a right to regulate the banks which were the creations of its own laws.

And since this session of Congress began the Circuit Court of the United States has vindicated the right of the State to regulate fire insurance, even to the extent of fixing rates of insurance.

Upon all of these matters the rights of the States are superior to those of the Federal Government. They should be protected of their exercise of these rights and their general police power free from Federal influence.

And in view of the fact that it is now asserted that a Territory is to be denied admission to the Union because of the manner it has provided for choosing judges, I deem it a proper time to say that before the expiration of the present Congress I shall see that the Members of this House are given an opportunity to vote upon an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which will change the term of service of Federal district judges from a life term to that of a limited term of years; and another amendment which will empower Congress, in its discretion, to provide laws for the election of the district judges by the people of the districts in which they serve. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Speaker, laws concerning the election of Senators and Members of Congress rest upon entirely a different basis. A constitutional Congress means a free Congress elected by free voters. I have not the slightest disposition to have the Federal Government interfere with local election laws.

We are contending to-day with three great dangers to the purity and integrity of the American electorate. They are race prejudice—the prejudice which grows out of conflicts between organized labor and capital—and most eminent of all, the danger of the use of money in elections.

We welcome laws proscribing educational qualifications, secrecy of the ballot, and even property qualifications when necessary as a remedy for the first two of these evils.

All we ask of any section of the country is that these laws be fair and just in their application. But, Mr. Speaker, the last, "the use of money," is the most dangerous of the three, and its solution will aid greatly in obviating the evils of race prejudice and the contest between labor in elections.

It is evident that we have traveled far in the wrong direction since the day when the average citizen of the Republic awoke with a gasp at the news that in the year of 1884 Jay Gould had saved the credit and honor of a national campaign committee by the generous contribution of $50,000. [Applause.]

Mr. OLMSTED. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. JACKSON. Since then it has become fashionable, and at times not even unpopular, to mix a little "bad politics" with good business. It is a fact often given publicity and never denied that Mr. Havemeyer, of the Sugar Trust, and no doubt other trust barons as well, contributed about equally to the campaign funds of the two parties of the country. And it is to be noted that through all the vicissitudes of party strife and fortune and the business depressions of high tariffs and low tariffs for a number of years the differential in favor of refined sugar has not suffered seriously, not even though it became necessary in the name of humanity to enter into reciprocal trade relations with Cuba and the islands of the seas.

In 1896, when the great issue of sound money was before the people for settlement, the standard bearers of the great parties were each as honest and as clean men as ever honored American politics with their services; and yet the campaign degenerated into a contest between the money barrels of the silver barons of the West and the great money houses of the East. Money was sent into nearly every State of the Union by the Republicans, and Chairman Jones of the Democracy made no objection, except that of the shortness of funds of his own committee. And now the extravagances of campaigning have so increased that we hear of national campaigns which have cost a million and a half and even two million of dollars.

I am far from asserting that any part of this money has been unlawfully or immorally expended in the common acceptation of that term. I am speaking now of the bad influence of extravagance in the use of such funds. It must be admitted, however, that two investigations into the honesty of elections ordered at one session by one branch of Congress, and in still another State from the ones in which these investigations are to take place the indictment for bribery of a large percentage of the entire electorate of a county, constitutes a condition of affairs unprecedented in the history of the Nation, and may well be heeded as a call to Congress to put forth its utmost power to stamp out this evil from the entire country.

Less campaign funds will tend to decrease the price of Chautauqua lectures. By reducing the number of professional spellbinders on the pay rolls of campaign committees at $500 and $1,000 per week we will increase competition on the lecture platform, if not the quality of the lectures. By reducing the number of "honest farmers" who must be paid for their time by campaign committees we may increase the corn crop; and with less milking of the committees and skimming of the cream of campaign funds we may increase the help badly needed by wives and children to do the milking on the farms and to market the cream.

The use of inordinate sums of money in campaigns is un-American and undemocratic. It puts a premium on greed and avarice and magnifies these qualities into political ideals of the Nation. It encourages machine and boss domination. Money from favored interests, pampered political pets, and jack-pot politicians constitute the levers, the burrs, the linchpins, and the steam rollers of every corrupt political machine of the country. The leaders of these machines sometimes reach the ears of judges on the bench with the clamors of the mob, thereby committing outrageous and hideous treason. And it has been intimated even that some contributors to campaign funds have disturbed the judicial mind, and thus the scales of justice, by rude hints of the rights of property and vested interests when the rights of the public were on the other side of the lawsuit.

It reaches the public press, and therefore poisons the public mind itself.

I have not argued, nor do I intend to intimate, that public opinion has ever been overridden by the power of money in politics where the issue was clearly drawn and the public aroused, nor can it ever be. But the people of this country have the right to a free fight and a fair deal on every public question. The courts have given to the corporations and the property interests the rights of persons under the law, but they have never yet been given the right to vote or the power of the ballot.

Mr. Speaker, in this and immediately succeeding sessions of Congress most important questions are for settlement. We can not afford to hesitate longer in getting our house in readiness for those important trials.

We are here now in the midst of summer grappling with a century-old problem. To paraphrase loosely the familiar words of Lincoln, this country can not continue half free trade and half protection; we can not continue long half depending on platform promises and the other half depending on the inaction of statesmen. We must come to a compromise on reasonable tariff rates, a definite means of their ascertainment and enactment into law.

We are facing the greatest upheaval of modern political thought on the question of combinations in trade and the distribution of property. A little lack of toleration on the part of the radicals or of wisdom on the part of the conservatives may threaten the safety of the Nation itself.

Pressing hard upon us for settlement upon the floors of Congress is the question of credit and the future monetary system of the country. Perhaps no other question comes so closely to the material welfare, or lack of welfare, of all the people as does this one. Credit means the power to wait and to bide one's time, to scorn drouth, and famine, and stress, and storm, and to act when better days arrive. Lack of credit means discouragement and failure under the withering blight of temporary misfortune. With credit there is ease and comfort and power on one side of every contract, and on the other, with lack of credit, there is misery and compulsion.

On all of these questions the people of this country have the right to a free election of free representatives. The present

Congress owes to them the duty of preserving the integrity of its elections, and by this means the wisdom and faithfulness of its membership. [Applause.]

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the same request to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has 2 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Missouri 12 minutes.

Mr. OLMSTED. I will yield the 2 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama if he desires it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I would have been very glad, indeed, if I had had the opportunity, with sufficient time, to express my views on the subject of this bill. To my mind it is an important bill, and ought to be thoroughly considered and digested. The fact is, this House repudiated this primary election feature of this bill when this bill first came before the House. I believe, Mr. Speaker, fully and frankly that it is a bill that is calculated to produce strife and to bring friction under certain circumstances where it is not needed or necessary. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] intimated very clearly when he made that investigation about how many votes were cast in certain districts in Alabama and other Southern States, what the purpose of this legislation might finally be. I am opposed to this bill, Mr. Speaker, because there is no authority given by the Constitution for the Congress of the United States to prescribe regulations or take control of the primary elections or conventions of the State for the nomination of Members of Congress or Senators. I am opposed to the bill, for there is no necessity or demand for the same. Alabama, and I think most all of the Southern States, have provided by statute for the publication of all expenses incident to a campaign for a nomination in a primary election or convention. I am opposed to this bill because it is vicious and ultimately means disturbance.

I am opposed to the bill, because every day since I have been a Member of this Congress I have been one of the most consistent advocates of peace and quiet and of a full restoration of all of the friendly patriotic relations between the North and the South. This bill means a menace to a continuation of these relations. I am no alarmist. I know as well as you do that many futile efforts have been made, for partisan purposes, to break up the established order for the regulation of suffrage in the Southern States. The real purpose of this bill is not publicity, for we have never tried to shun publicity, never sought to seek to evade anything of that kind, but under the necessities of the Southern States we have had to resort to certain procedure there, and that we never made any secrecy about what we did or how we did it. And I fear that legislation of this kind will open those old sores and will bring back unkind and unfriendly feeling that ought not to exist. At least it opens the way to efforts of that kind.

The South is getting along well. We have good laws there relative to publicity, relative to assessment, and to campaign expenses—laws that we made to suit our own tastes and ideas. It is, Mr. Speaker, an essential part of the police power of a State to prescribe rules for its primaries and conventions. What is the necessity of interfering with it? I have heard the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], in this discussion several times, throw out what I thought he hardly meant, or ought not to have meant, some reflections upon the South as to publicity. We are not afraid of publicity. We court it and ask it.

But I tell you, gentlemen, we are afraid, we are uneasy, and while that section of the country is progressing and developing so rapidly, we do not want any restoration of the bad feelings that came years ago between the sections. We are watchful and alert on that subject. The Supreme Court of the United States has twice, for instance, passed upon the constitutionality of the constitution of Alabama. Why do you want to disturb the decision of our highest court?

I have said in the course of this discussion on this floor today that there was a greater necessity for submitting a bill of this character to the arbitrament of a Democratic caucus than any bill of this extraordinary session of Congress. There we could have thrashed it out among Democrats without the biased suggestions of our Republican friends. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], who has manifested an unusual zeal in behalf of including primary elections and conventions for nominations in this bill, addressed our last Democratic caucus for quite an hour explaining that the Senate had added the primary feature to the bill. He did not ask to submit it to the caucus. No man pretends to deny that decided opposition was expressed in that caucus to the primary feature, which had already been voted down in the House.

But how does it come before us now? Under the guidance and direction of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] and his associate on the conference, the bill, by conference report, comes before the House containing the offensive features for the regulation, government, and control of State primary elections and conventions for nominations—which the House had recently rejected—to be arbitrated by Republicans, and thereby guarantee the certain discomfiture of opposing Democrats. I wish, Mr. Speaker, in order to show clearly what I mean, to quote the following paragraph from the conference report:

Every person who shall be a candidate for nomination at any primary election or nominating convention, or for election at any general or special election, as Representative in the Congress of the United States, shall, not less than 10 nor more than 15 days before the day for holding such primary election or nominating convention, and not less than 10 nor more than 15 days before the day of the general or special election at which candidates for Representative are to be elected, file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives at Washington, D. C., a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent, from any source, in aid or support of his candidacy, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part; and such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value given, contributed, expended, used, or promised by such candidate, or by his agent, representative, or other person for and in his behalf, with his knowledge and consent, together with the names of all those to whom any and all such gifts, contributions, payments, or promises were made for the purpose of procuring his nomination or election.

Heretofore we have made our reports of this kind to our secretary of state, at Montgomery, Ala., and other States do likewise. Under this bill we must send these reports, as directed, to the Clerk of the House of Representatives. What good and sufficient reason can be given for this innovation? "I am afraid of the Greeks bearing presents." How easy would it be for a disappointed opponent to trump up some pretext to show that the nominating primary was not altogether regular, or something else of that kind. Listen to what the conference report says about the election of Senators:

Every person who shall be a candidate for nomination at any primary election or nominating convention, or for indorsement at any general or special election, or election by the legislature of any State, as Senator in the Congress of the United States, shall, not less than 10 nor more than 15 days before the day for holding such primary election or nominating convention, and not less than 10 nor more than 15 days before the day of the general or special election at which he is seeking indorsement, and not less than 5 nor more than 10 days before the day upon which the first vote is to be taken in the two houses of the legislature before which he is a candidate for election as Senator, file with the Secretary of the Senate at Washington, D. C., a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent, from any source, in aid or support of his candidacy, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part; and such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value given, contributed, expended, used, or promised by such candidate, or by his agent, representative, or other person for and in his behalf with his knowledge and consent, together with the names of all those to whom any and all such gifts, contributions, payments, or promises were made for the purpose of procuring his nomination or election.

What business has the Federal Government with matters of this kind? The authority of the Federal Government is clearly defined in the Constitution as to the time for election of Members of Congress and Senators. It is merely a direction, but can anyone say that the paragraphs above quoted are a direction? It is an explicit demand and command, and if not literally complied with would vitiate and annul the nomination made. I wish it distinctly understood that I am not opposing this conference report, because I am not opposed to the broadest and fullest publicity in matters that will tend to justify our elections. It is not on that ground that I oppose this bill, but it is because it is an unjust, unauthorized, and vexatious interference by the Federal Government with the internal local affairs of a State.

If the Federal Government can direct and control the primary elections of a State, what power or authority does the State possess that the same authority can not lay its heavy hand on? I believe in the lawful autonomy of the States, and I protest against the rapidly increasing centralization of the power and authority of the States at Washingon. I believe that this bill, enacted into law, will come to vex and harass us in the future. It is for these reasons and many others that I earnestly oppose this conference report.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I did not intend to participate in this discussion, and I would not do so at this late moment but for the fact that I have heard on this floor echoes of statements that I have seen in the newspapers to the effect that the southern Members of Congress, who are conscientiously opposed to this proposition because of their constitutional belief, were seeking to shun publicity as to the primaries, which were their real elections. I want to say to the House and to the country that if there is a single Southern State that has not already a better law on publicity than this law I would like to hear its name called on this floor. So that, although the proposition is that we shall take a law in the exercise of paramount and possibly exclusive Federal power, that may supersede every provision of every State law of every Southern State, when that proposition is put before us and some of us can not agree to it, the charge is hurled at us across this aisle and on the floor, that we are doing it because we do not want any publicity in our primary elections, whereas the truth is and the fact is that we have got infinitely more already under our State laws than we will have under this bill, if it should be adopted.

Mr. Speaker, just one word more and then I have finished with this matter. The Federal Constitution, section 4 of Article I, provides that the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Members of Congress may be regulated by Congress. I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] to tell me whether or not the election referred to was not the legal election, the election provided by the Constitution, and whether the word "election" as used in the Constitution could be held to include a party primary or must be held to mean only the legal election. I have heard no reply from him or anyone else. I am clearly of the opinion, after careful deliberation, that the "election" which Congress has the power to regulate is the election provided for in the Constitution itself. I can not therefore vote for the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back my time. I wish I had the time in which to yield to the gentleman from Kansas, but I can not trespass on the courtesy of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in concluding this debate I must say I am surprised at some of the objections I have heard, both on this side and on that side, to the enactment of this bill into law. One of the most distinguished gentlemen on the other side of the aisle, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], is very much in favor of the principle of publicity, but must vote against this law because it is possible for somebody to construe some feature of it different from what somebody else would construe it. Does not the distinguished gentleman realize that such reasoning as he indulges in, if accepted, would prevent the passage of any bill which is now pending before this Congress, or which ever has been before this Congress during his long and honorable service here? Mr. Speaker, this law, like every production of the human mind, has its imperfections. Gentlemen like the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, who believe in the great principle involved in this bill, should strive to strengthen its weak places and not to destroy it because it is not as perfect as they would have it. They should espouse it and embrace the legislation, believing and knowing that when imperfections are revealed a Congress which will come after us will cure such defects as we may leave in the measure.

Gentlemen on this side insist that the people of a certain section have no objection to giving publicity to contributions for campaign expenses in primary elections. I concede it. I have taken no position hostile to that contention. I believe they want to give publicity. I believe the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] really dotes on publishing campaign expenses in the primaries [laughter], but the trouble is he wants to act under a State law and not under a Federal law. I am sorry we can not oblige him and those who sympathize with him in the views he has just expressed.

I have learned long since to admire the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, not only for his lovable qualities and his genial good nature, but for his great learning as a lawyer and his simon-pure Democracy. I take no exception to his speech of criticism just delivered. Since I can not conform my judgment to his, I shall strive to survive his criticism and to recover from the body blows inflicted. One would be justified, perhaps, in concluding that the gentleman from Georgia and myself have come to the parting of the ways. I am reluctant to believe it. We have been friends so long I dread to sever the ties that bind us. If severed they must be, if, indeed, we have come to the parting of the ways, then in deep affliction I say to him in poetic language:

With all my soul, then, let us part,
Since both are anxious to be free;
And I will send you back your heart
If you will send mine back to me.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Speaker, there is no politics in this legislation. There is nothing in it except double-distilled Democracy, which our Republican friends, because of its superior quality, are trying to appropriate. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen can talk eloquently about telegrams having been received from distinguished Democrats and of great Democratic leaders who have spoken in behalf of publicity of campaign expenses, but who have not specifically included in their advocacy expenses incurred in primary elections; but I say to them the demand embraces the primary election. The demand for publicity can not be met unless we require a disclosure of money spent in the election which really elects, and this, in very many instances, is the primary election.

Mr. LITTLETON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LITTLETON. Will the gentleman tell the House how he would justify the control of the primary convention and election under the exercise of the power of Congress?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I will answer that question very briefly, in this way: We can not control, and I have never attempted and never will attempt to control, a convention or primary election by Federal legislation. The trouble is, some gentleman insists on placing a construction upon this law which is wholly unwarranted and unjustified. This bill gives no Federal control over conventions, primary elections, or even over general elections. Who can find in the legislation here proposed one word which authorizes directly or by implication Federal interference with any State election? There is no provision in the bill which can be tortured into such authorization. No citizen can be proceeded against under this bill unless he violates its provisions, and if a candidate for a Federal office violates a Federal law, why should he not be proceeded against in a Federal court?

Mr. RICHARDSON. If a citizen of Alabama, under this primary law, is punished in a Federal court, would the gentleman advocate that?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. This law applies only to men who seek to become Members of this House or the other House at the other end of the Capitol. No man should be a Member of this House who will willfully violate a law enacted to safeguard and purify elections.

Mr. RICHARDSON. He would be tried in a Federal court, would he not?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes; the same as the man who is tried under the provisions of the interstate-commerce act, which the gentleman from Alabama took such pains to help enact. The only difficulty here is that gentlemen draw a finespun distinction between elections and primary elections. So far as my district is concerned, as I have stated before, my nomination is equivalent to my election; and if you excluded the primary election expense in such a district you might as well require no publicity, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Does the gentleman contend that the interstate-commerce law——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I do not care to talk about that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You charged me with it. You will not let me answer. I did help to make that law.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to continue just one moment, I would like to say to this House that I believe your committee has brought in a measure that reflects the will of the people of the United States; and, let me add, it is the measure which I promised the Democrats in caucus and promised the House in session we would bring in. We have put nothing in the bill nor have we taken anything out of it that everybody did not know would be put in or taken out.

The measure is a wise and good one. It will tend to purify the ballot boxes of this country, and will guarantee that men who come here shall come with the support and backed by the judgment of the people and not as a result of corrupt methods. It will protect the people in the South and it will protect the people in the North. If enforced, as I hope it will be, it will restore the integrity of elections and protect the future manhood of our country from the blighting and damning consequences of the corrupt use of money.

Mr. MADISON. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield now. I have only one minute more.

Mr. MADISON. I only wish to ask one question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I hope that my friends on this side, who have voiced their opposition to some of the provisions of this bill and indulged in some harmless criticisms of my action, will allow me to say that I take their criticisms kindly. I have discharged my duty. I submit to whatever of infliction they have imposed upon me, and now I invite them, not as a new leader, as my friend from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] said, but as a humble instrument in the hands of my party, I appeal to every man here to stand by his convictions, to stand by the expressed will of the people of the country, and help to drive corruption into hiding and make election to office honorable in the United States. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon this conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that each gentleman who has addressed the House may have permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BARLETT. For how long?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. For five days, on this bill.

Mr. MANN. If gentlemen want to extend their remarks, now is a very good time to ask permission.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I make that request in behalf of those who have addressed the House.

Mr. MANN. If there are any who desire that permission, let them make the request.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. It will take that much more time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, if I want to, to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 282, nays 27, answered "present" 5, not voting 71, as follows:

THE TARIFF ON WOOL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read (S. Doc. No. 101):

To the House of Representatives:

I return without my approval House bill No. 11019 with a statement of my reasons for so doing.

The bill is an amendment of the existing tariff law, and readjusts the customs duties in what is known as Schedule K, embracing wool and the manufactures of wool.

I was elected to the Presidency as the candidate of a party which in its platform declared its aim and purpose to be to maintain a protective tariff by "the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries." I have always regarded this language as fixing the proper measure of protection at the ascertained difference between the cost of production at home and that abroad, and have construed the reference to the profit of American industries as intended, not to add a new element to the measure stated or to exclude from the cost of production abroad the element of a manufacturer's or producer's profit, but only to emphasize the importance of including in the American cost a manufacturer's or producer's profit reasonable according to the American standard.

In accordance with a promise made in the same platform I called an extra session of the Sixty-first Congress, at which a general revision of the tariff was made and adopted in the Payne bill. It was contended by those who opposed the Payne bill that the existing rates of the Dingley bill were excessive and that the rates adopted in the revising statute were not sufficiently reduced to conform to the promised measure.

The great difficulty, however, in discussing the new rates adopted was that there were no means available by which impartial persons could determine what, in fact, was the difference in cost of production between the products of this country and the same products abroad. The American public became deeply impressed with the conviction that, in order to secure a proper revision of the tariff in the future, exact information as to the effect of the new rates must be had, and that the evil of logrolling or a compromise between advocates of different protected industries in fixing duties could be avoided, and the interest of the consuming public could be properly guarded, only by revising the tariff one schedule at a time.

To help these reforms for the future, I took advantage of a clause in the Payne tariff bill enabling me to create a Tariff Board of three members and directed them to make a glossary and encyclopedia of the terms used in the tariff and to secure information as to the comparative cost of production of dutiable articles under the tariff at home and abroad. In my message to Congress of December 7, 1909, I asked a continuing annual appropriation for the support of the board and said:

> I believe that the work of this board will be of prime utility and importance whenever Congress shall deem it wise again to readjust the customs duties. If the facts secured by the Tariff Board are of such a character as to show generally that the rates of duties imposed by the present tariff law are excessive under the principles of protection as described in the platform of the successful party at the late election, I shall not hesitate to invite the attention of Congress to this fact and to the necessity for action predicated thereon. Nothing, however, halts business and interferes with the course of prosperity so much as the threatened revision of the tariff, and until the facts are at hand, after careful and deliberate investigation, upon which such revision can properly be undertaken, it seems to me unwise to attempt it. The amount of misinformation that creeps into arguments pro and con in respect to tariff rates is such as to require the kind of investigation that I have directed the Tariff Board to make, an investigation undertaken by it wholly without respect to the effect which the facts may have in calling for a readjustment of the rates of duty.

A popular demand arose for the formal creation by law of a permanent nonpartisan tariff commission. Commercial bodies all over the country united in a movement to secure adequate legislation for this purpose and an association with a nation-wide constituency was organized to promote the cause. The public opinion in favor of such a commission was evidenced by resolutions adopted in 1909 and 1910 by Republican State conventions in at least 28 States.

In addition, efforts were made to secure a change in the rules of procedure in the House and Senate with a view to preventing the consideration of tariff changes except schedule by schedule.

The business of the country rests on a protective-tariff basis. The public keenly realized that a disturbance of business by a change in the tariff and a threat of injury to the industries of the country ought to be avoided, and that nothing could help so much to minimize the fear of destructive changes as the known existence of a reliable source of information for legislative action. The deep interest in the matter of an impartial ascertainment of facts before any new revision, was evidenced by an effort to pass a tariff-commission bill in the short session of the Sixty-first Congress, in which many of both parties united. Such a bill passed both Houses. It provided a commission of five members, to be appointed by the President, not more than three of whom were to belong to the same party, and gave them the power and made it their duty to investigate the operation of the tariff, the comparative cost of production at home and abroad, and like matters of importance in fixing the terms of a revenue measure, and required them to report to the Executive and to Congress when directed. Several, not vital, amendments were made in the Senate, which necessitated a return of the bill to the House, where, because of the limited duration of the session, a comparatively small minority were able to prevent its becoming a law.

On the failure of this bill, I took such steps as I could to make the Tariff Board I had already appointed a satisfactory substitute for the proposed tariff commission. An appropriation of $225,000, to continue the work until June 30, 1912, had been granted by Congress in the alternative, to be applied to the board I had appointed, unless a tariff-commission bill was passed. In this appropriation bill the nonpartisan tariff commission, if created and appointed, was directed to make a report on Schedule K by December 1, 1911. Accordingly I added two members to the Tariff Board from the opposition party, and directed the board to make report on Schedule K by December 1 next. The board differs in no way from the tariff commission as it would have been, except in its power to summon witnesses; and I am advised by the members of the board that, without this power, they have had no difficulty in securing the information they desire.

The board took some months to investigate the methods pursued in other countries in procuring information on tariff subjects and to organize its force. In October, 1910, its work of investigation began with a force of 40 that has now increased to 80. In addition to the "glossary," which is near completion, and other work connected with furnishing information in connection with the enforcement of the maximum and minimum clause of the Payne Tariff Act, and in respect to the Canadian reciprocity measure, its attention has been especially directed to comparative cost under Schedule K (wool and woolens), under Schedule M (paper and pulp), and under Schedule I (cotton manufactures). The report on Schedule M (pulp and paper) has already been sent to Congress. Full reports on wool and cotton will be submitted to Congress in December. I have also directed an investigation into the metal and leather schedules, the results of which it is hoped can be submitted to Congress at its first regular session in time to permit their consideration and legislative action, if necessary.

The organization known as the Tariff Commission Association, made up of representatives of substantially all the commercial bodies of the country, for the purpose of securing the establishment of a permanent tariff commission, applied to me for an opportunity to investigate the methods pursued by the Tariff Board. This I was glad to grant, and a very full report of the competent committee of that association concluded as follows:

> In conclusion, our committee finds that the Tariff Board is composed of able, impartial, and earnest men, who are devoting their energies unreservedly to the work before them; that the staff has been carefully selected for the work in view, is efficiently organized and directed, and includes a number of exceptionally competent technical experts; * * * that the work of the board, vast and intricate in detail, is already highly organized, well systematized, and running smoothly; and that Congress and the people can now await the completion of that work with entire confidence that it is progressing as rapidly as consistent with proper thoroughness, and that it will amply justify all of the time and expense which it entails. We believe that the value of the work when completed will be so great and so evident as to leave remaining no single doubt as to the expediency of maintaining it as a permanent function of the Government for the benefit of the people.

I have thus reviewed the history of the movement for the establishment of a tariff commission or board in order to show that the real advance and reform in tariff making are to be found in the acquiring of accurate and impartial information as to the effect of the proposed tariff changes under each schedule before they are adopted, and further to show that if delay in the passage of a bill to amend Schedule K can be had until December, Congress will then be in possession of a full and satisfactory report upon the whole schedule.

This brings me to the consideration of the terms of the bill presented for my approval. Schedule K is the most complicated schedule in the tariff. It classifies raw wool with different rates for different classes; it affords the manufacturer what is called a compensatory duty to make up for the increased price of the raw material he has to use due to the rate on raw wool, and for the shrinkage that takes place in scouring the wool for manufacture; and it gives him, in addition, an ad valorem duty to protect him against foreign competition with cheap labor. The usages which prevail in scouring the wool, in making the yarn, and in the manufacture of cloth present a complication of technical detail that prevents anyone, not especially informed concerning wool growing and manufacture, from understanding the schedule and the effect of changes in the various rates and percentages.

If there ever was a schedule that needed consideration and investigation and elaborate explanation by experts before its amendment, it is Schedule K. There is a widespread belief that many rates in the present schedule are too high and are in excess of any needed protection for the wool grower or manufacturer. I share this belief and have so stated in several public addresses. But I have no sufficient data upon which I can judge how Schedule K ought to be amended or how its rates ought to be reduced, in order that the new bill shall furnish the proper measure of protection and no more. Nor have I sources of information which satisfy me that the bill presented to me for signature will accomplish this result. The parliamentary history of the bill is not reassuring upon this point. It was introduced and passed in the House as providing a tariff for revenue only and with the avowed purpose of departing from a protective-tariff policy. The rate of duty on raw wools of all classes was changed from a specific duty of 11 cents a pound to 20 per cent ad valorem. On the average for the importations for the last two years this is a reduction from 47.24 per cent to 20 per cent. Rates on cloths were reduced in the bill from the present average duty of 97.27 per cent to 40 per cent and on wearing apparel from 81.31 per cent to 45 per cent. The bill was defeated in the Senate, and so was a substitute introduced as a protection measure. The proposed substitute fixed the duty on raw wool, first class, at 40 per cent, and on a second class of carpet wools at 10 per cent, and on cloths at 60 per cent, and on wearing apparel at the same rate. On reconsideration, a compromise measure was passed by the Senate, which was a compromise between the House bill and the Senate substitute bill, and in which the rate on first-class wool was fixed at 35 per cent, on carpet wools 10 per cent, and on cloth and wearing apparel 55 per cent. In conference between the two Houses the rate on all classes of raw wool was fixed at 29 per cent, this being an increase on carpet wools of 9 per cent as fixed in the House bill and of 19 per cent as fixed in the Senate bill. The conference rate on cloths and wearing apparel was fixed at 49 per cent. No evidence as to the cost of production here or abroad was published, and the compromise amendment in the Senate was adopted without reference to or consideration by a committee.

I do not mention these facts to criticize the method of preparation of the bill; but I must needs refer to them to show that the congressional proceedings make available for me no accurate or scientifically acquired information which enables me to determine that the bill supplies the measure of protection promised in the platform on which I was elected.

Without any investigation of which the details are available, an avowed tariff-for-revenue and antiprotection bill is by compromise blended with a professed protection bill. Rates between those of the two bills are adopted and passed, except that, in some important instances, rates are fixed in the compromise at a figure higher, and in others at a figure lower, than were originally fixed in either House. The principle followed in adjusting the amendments of existing law is, therefore, not clear, and the effect of the bill is most uncertain.

The Wilson Tariff Act of 1894, while giving the manufacturer free wool, provided as high duties on leading manufactures of wool as does the present bill, which at the same time taxes the manufacturer's raw material at 29 per cent. Thus the protection afforded to manufacturers under the Wilson bill was very considerably higher than under the present bill.

During the years in which the Wilson bill was in force the woolen manufacturers suffered. Many mills were compelled to shut down. These were abnormal years, and it is not necessary to attribute the hard times solely to the tariff act of 1894. But it was at least an addition to other factors operating to injure the woolen business. It is the only experience we have had for a generation of a radical revision of this schedule, and, without exaggerating its importance, one pledged to a moderate protection policy may well hesitate before giving approval without full information to legislation which makes a more radical reduction in the protection actually afforded to manufacturers of wool than did the Wilson Act. Nor does this hesitation arise only for fear of injury to manufacturers. Unless manufacturers are able to continue their business and buy wool from domestic woolgrowers the latter will have no benefit from the tariff that is supposed to protect them, because they will have to sell in competition with foreign wools or send their sheep to the shambles. Hence the woolgrower is as much interested in the protection of the manufacturer as he is in his own.

It may well be that conditions of manufacture in this country have changed so as to require much less protection now for the manufacturers than at the time of the Wilson bill; but in view of the possible wide suffering involved by hasty action based on insufficient knowledge, the wise course, in my judgment, is to postpone any change for a few months needed to complete the pending inquiry.

When I have the accurate information which justifies such action, I shall recommend to Congress as great a reduction in Schedule K as the measure of protection, already stated, will permit. The failure of the present bill should not be regarded, therefore, as taking away the only chance for reduction by this Congress.

More than a million of our countrymen are engaged in the production of wool and the manufacture of woolens; more than a billion of the country's capital is invested in the industry. Large communities are almost wholly dependent upon the prosperity of the woolgrower and the woolen manufacturer. Moderately estimated, 5,000,000 of the American people will be injuriously affected by any ill-advised impairment of the wool and woolen industries. Certainly we should proceed prudently in dealing with them upon the basis of ascertained facts rather than hastily and without knowledge to make a reduction of the tariff to satisfy a popular desire, which I fully recognize, for reduction of duties believed to be excessive. I have no doubt that if I were to sign this bill, I would receive the approval of very many persons who favor a reduction of duties in order to reduce the cost of living whatever the effect on our protected industries, and who fail to realize the disaster to business generally and to the people at large which may come from a radical disturbance of that part of business dependent for its life on the continuance of a protective tariff. If I fail to guard as far as I can the industries of the country to the extent of giving them the benefit of a living measure of protection, and business disaster ensues, I shall not be discharging my duty. If I fail to recommend the reduction of excessive duties to this extent, I shall fail in my duty to the consuming public.

There is no public exigency requiring the revision of Schedule K in August without adequate information, rather than in December next with such information. December was the time fixed by both parties in the last Congress for the submission of adequate information upon Schedule K with a view to its amendment. Certainly the public weal is better preserved by delaying 90 days in order to do justice, and make such a reduction as shall be proper, than now blindly to enact a law which may seriously injure the industries involved and the business of the country in general.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 17, 1911.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to have the President's message referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, but prefer to have it lie on the Speaker's table, and to give notice at this time that on to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal, I shall move to pass the bill over the veto of the President. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the message will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of inserting page 10 and to the end of the first paragraph on page 11 of Senate Document No. 164, Sixty-first Congress, second session, being that portion of the President's speech delivered at Winona, Minn., September 17, 1909, in which he denounced the wool schedule of the Payne tariff bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a part of the President's Winona speech. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman desires to insert the entire speech of the President, I have no objection. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, the message of the President just read refers to the wool bill, and the part of the Winona speech I desire to insert refers particularly to the wool schedule of the Payne bill. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] desires to object, very well.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object, unless the gentleman desires to insert the entire speech. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Well, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the entire speech of the President be inserted.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I have no right, under the rules, to object to the gentleman from Illinois making that request, and I will not, of course, object to the request if he really desires to insert the whole speech.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, whose request for unanimous consent was submitted by the Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asked unanimous consent to publish in the RECORD the entire speech the President made at Winona.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Inasmuch as the speech has been already published, Mr. Speaker, I object. [Cries of "Too late!"]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

The speech is as follows:

MY FELLOW CITIZENS: As long ago as August, 1906, in the congressional campaign in Maine, I ventured to announce that I was a tariff revisionist and thought that the time had come for a readjustment of the schedules. I pointed out that it had been 10 years prior to that time that the Dingley bill had been passed; that great changes had taken place in the conditions surrounding the productions of the farm, the factory, and the mine, and that under the theory of protection in that time the rates imposed in the Dingley bill in many instances might have become excessive; that is, might have been greater than the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production at home with a sufficient allowance for a reasonable rate of profit to the American producer. I said that the party was divided on the issue, but that in my judgment the opinion of the party was crystallizing and would probably result in the near future in an effort to make such revision. I pointed out the difficulty that there always was in a revision of the tariff, due to the threatened disturbance of industries to be affected and the suspension of business, in a way which made it unwise to have too many revisions. In the summer of 1907 my position on the tariff was challenged, and I then entered into a somewhat fuller discussion of the matter. It was contended by the so-called "standpatters" that rates beyond the necessary measure of protection were not objectionable, because behind the tariff wall competition always reduced the prices, and thus saved the consumer. But I pointed out in that speech what seems to me as true to-day as it then was, that the danger of excessive rates was in the temptation they created to form monopolies in the protected articles, and thus to take advantage of the excessive rates by increasing the prices, and therefore, and in order to avoid such a danger, it was wise at regular intervals to examine the question of what the effect of the rates had been upon the industries in this country, and whether the conditions with respect to the cost of production here had so changed as to warrant a reduction in the tariff and to make a lower rate truly protective of the industry.

It will be observed that the object of the revision under such a statement was not to destroy protected industries in this country, but it was to continue to protect them where lower rates offered a sufficient protection to prevent injury by foreign competition. That was the object of the revision as advocated by me, and it was certainly the object of the revision as promised in the Republican platform.

I want to make as clear as I can this proposition, because, in order to determine whether a bill is a compliance with the terms of that platform, it must be understood what the platform means. A free trader is opposed to any protective rate because he thinks that our manufacturers, our farmers, and our miners ought to withstand the competition of foreign manufacturers and miners and farmers, or else go out of business and find something else more profitable to do. Now, certainly the promises of the platform did not contemplate the downward revision of the tariff rates to such a point that any industry theretofore protected should be injured. Hence, those who contend that the promise of the platform was to reduce prices by letting in foreign competition are contending for a free trade, and not for anything that they had the right to infer from the Republican platform.

The Ways and Means Committee of the House, with Mr. PAYNE at its head, spent a full year in an investigation, assembling evidence in reference to the rates under the tariff, and devoted an immense amount of work in the study of the question where the tariff rates could be reduced and where they ought to be raised with a view to maintaining a reasonably protective rate, under the principles of the platform, for every industry that deserved protection. They found that the determination of the question, what was the actual cost of production, and whether an industry in this country could live under a certain rate and withstand threatened competition from abroad, was most difficult. The manufacturers were prone to exaggerate the injury which a reduction in the duty would give and to magnify the amount of duty that was needed; while the importers, on the other hand, who were interested in developing the importation from foreign shores, were quite likely to be equally biased on the other side.

Mr. PAYNE reported a bill—the Payne tariff bill—which went to the Senate and was amended in the Senate by increasing the duty on some things and decreasing it on others. The difference between the House bill and the Senate bill was very much less than the newspapers represented. It turns out upon examination that the reductions in the Senate were about equal to those in the House, though they differed in character. Now, there is nothing quite so difficult as the discussion of a tariff bill, for the reason that it covers so many different items, and the meaning of the terms and the percentages are very hard to understand. The passage of a new bill, especially where a change in the method of assessing the duties has been followed, presents an opportunity for various modes and calculations of the percentages of increases and decreases that are most misleading and really throw no light at all upon the changes made.

One way of stating what was done is to say what the facts show—that under the Dingley law there were 2,024 items. This included dutiable items only. The Payne law leaves 1,150 of these items unchanged. There are decreases in 654 of the items and increases in 220 of the items. Now, of course, that does not give a full picture, but it does show the proportion of decreases to have been three times those of the increases. Again, the schedules are divided into letters from A to N. The first schedule is that of chemicals, oils, etc. There are 232 items in the Dingley law; of these, 81 were decreased, 22 were increased, leaving 129 unchanged. Under Schedule B—earths, earthen and glass ware—there were 170 items in the Dingley law; 46 were decreased, 12 were increased, and 112 left unchanged. C is the schedule of metals and manufactures. There were 321 items in the Dingley law; 185 were decreased, 30 were increased, and 106 were left unchanged. D is the schedule of wood and manufactures of wood. There were 35 items in the Dingley law; 18 were decreased, 3 were increased, and 14 were left unchanged. There were 38 items in sugar, and of these 2 were decreased and 36 left unchanged. Schedule F covers tobacco and manufactures of tobacco, of which there were 8 items; they were all left unchanged. In the schedule covering agricultural products and provisions there were 187 items in the Dingley law; 14 of them were decreased, 19 were increased, and 154 left unchanged. Schedule H—that of spirits and wines—contained 33 items in the Dingley law; 4 were decreased, 23 increased, and 6 were left unchanged. In cotton manufactures there were 261 items; of these 28 were decreased, 47 increased, and 186 left unchanged. In Schedule J—flax, hemp, and jute—there were 254 items in the Dingley law; 187 were reduced, 4 were increased, and 63 left unchanged. In wool and manufactures thereof, there were 78 items; 3 were decreased, none were increased, and 75 left unchanged. In silk and silk goods there were 78 items; of these 21 were decreased, 31 were increased, and 26 were left unchanged. In pulp, papers, and books there were 59 items in the Dingley law, and of these 11 were decreased, 9 were increased, and 39 left unchanged. In sundries there were 270 items, and of these 54 were decreased, 20 were increased, and 196 left unchanged. So that the total showed 2,024 items in the Dingley law, of which 654 were decreased, 220 were increased, making 874 changes, and 1,150 left unchanged.

Attempts have been made to show what the real effect of these changes has been by comparing the imports under the various schedules and assuming that the changes and their importance were in proportion to the importations. Nothing could be more unjust in a protective tariff which also contains revenue provisions. Some of the tariff is made for the purpose of increasing the revenue by increasing importations which shall pay duty. Other items in the tariff are made for the purpose of reducing competition—that is, by reducing importations—and, therefore, the question of the importance of a change in rate can not in the slightest degree be determined by the amount of imports that takes place. In order to determine the importance of the changes, it is much fairer to take the articles on which the rates of duty have been reduced and those on which the rates of duty have been increased and then determine from statistics how large a part the articles upon which duties have been reduced play in the consumption of the country and how large a part those upon which the duties have been increased play in the consumption of the country. Such a table has been prepared by Mr. Payne, than whom there is no one who understands better what the tariff is and who has given more attention to the details of the schedule.

Now, let us take Schedule A—chemicals, oils, and paints. The articles upon which the duty has been decreased are consumed in this country to the extent of $433,000,000. The articles upon which the duty has been increased are consumed in this country to the extent of $11,000,000. Take Schedule B. The articles on which the duty has been decreased entered in the consumption of the country to the amount of $128,000,000, and there has been no increase in duty on such articles. Take Schedule C—metals and their manufactures. The amount to which such articles enter into the consumption of the country is $1,221,000,000, whereas the articles of the same schedule upon which there has been an increase enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of only $37,000,000. Take Schedule D—lumber. The articles in this schedule upon which there has been a decrease enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $566,000,000, whereas the articles under the same schedule upon which there has been an increase enter into its consumption to the extent of $31,000,000. In tobacco there has been no change. In agricultural products, those in which there has been a reduction of rates enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $483,000,000; those in which there has been an increase enter into the consumption to the extent of $4,000,000. In the schedule of wines and liquors, the articles upon which there has been an increase enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $462,000,000. In cottons there has been a change in the higher-priced cottons and an increase.

There has been no increase in the lower-priced cottons, and of the increases the high-priced cottons enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $41,000,000. Schedule J—flax, hemp, and jute: The articles upon which there has been a decrease enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $22,000,000, while those upon which there has been an increase enter into the consumption to the extent of $804,000. In Schedule J as to wool, there has been no change. In Schedule L as to silk, the duty has been decreased on articles which enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $8,000,000, and has been increased on articles that enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $106,000,000. On paper and pulp the duty has been decreased on articles, including print paper, that enter into the consumpton of the country to the extent of $67,000,000, and increased on articles that enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $81,000,000. In sundries, or Schedule N, the duty has been decreased on articles that enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $1,719,000,000; and increased on articles that enter into the consumption of the country to the extent of $101,000,000.

It will be found that in Schedule A the increases covered only luxuries—perfumeries, pomades, and like articles; Schedule H—wines and liquors—which are certainly luxuries and are made subject to increase in order to increase the revenues, amounting to $462,000,000; and in Schedule L—silks—which are luxuries, certainly, $106,000,000, making a total of the consumption of those articles upon which there was an increase and which were luxuries of $579,000,000, leaving a balance of increase on articles, which were not luxuries, of value in consumption of only $272,000,000, as against $5,000,000,000, representing the amount of articles entering into the consumption of the country, mostly necessities, upon which there has been a reduction of duties, and to which the 650 decreases applied.

Statement.

Schedules.	Consumption value.
	Duties decreased.	Duties increased.
A. Chemicals, oils, and paints	$433,099,846	$11,105,820
B. Earths, earthenware, and glassware	128,423,732
C. Metals, and manufactures of	1,221,956,620	37,675,804
D. Wood, and manufactures of	566,870,950	31,280,372
E. Sugar, molasses, and manufactures of	300,965,953
F. Tobacco, and manufactures of (no change of rates)
G. Agricultural products and provisions	483,430,637	4,380,043
H. Spirits, wines, and other beverages		462,001,856
I. Cotton manufactures		41,622,024
J. Flax, hemp, jute, and manufactures of	22,127,145	804,445
K. Wool and manufactures of wool. (No production statistics available for articles affected by change of rates.)
L. Silks and silk goods	7,947,568	106,742,646
M. Pulp, papers, and books	67,628,055	81,486,466
N. Sundries	1,719,428,069	101,656,598
Total	4,951,878,575	878,756,074

Of the above increases the following are luxuries, being articles strictly of voluntary use:

Schedule A. Chemicals, including perfumeries, pomades, and like articles	$11,105,820
Schedule H. Wines and liquors	462,001,856
Schedule L. Silks	106,742,646
Total	579,850,322

This leaves a balance of increases which are not on articles of luxury of $298,905,752, as against decreases on about $5,000,000,000 of consumption.

Now, this statement shows as conclusively as possible the fact that there was a substantial downward revision on articles entering into the general consumption of the country which can be termed necessities, for the proportion is $5,000,000,000, representing the consumption of articles to which decreases applied, to less than $300,000,000 of articles of necessity to which the increases applied.

Now, the promise of the Republican platform was not to revise everything downward, and in the speeches which have been taken as interpreting that platform, which I made in the campaign, I did not promise that everything should go downward. What I promised was, that there should be many decreases, and that in some few things increases would be found to be necessary; but that on the whole I conceived that the change of conditions would make the revision necessarily downward—and that, I contend, under the showing which I have made, has been the result of the Payne bill. I did not agree, nor did the Republican Party agree, that we would reduce rates to such a point as to reduce prices by the introduction of foreign competition. That is what the free traders desire. That is what the revenue-tariff reformers desire; but that is not what the Republican platform promised, and it is not what the Republican Party wished to bring about. To repeat the statement with which I opened this speech, the proposition of the Republican Party was to reduce rates so as to maintain a difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production here, insuring a reasonable profit to the manufacturer on all articles produced in this country; and the proposition to reduce rates and prevent their being excessive was to avoid the opportunity for monopoly and the suppression of competition, so that the excessive rates could be taken advantage of to force prices up.

Now, it is said that there was not a reduction in a number of the schedules where there should have been. It is said that there was no reduction in the cotton schedule. There was not. The House and the Senate took evidence and found from cotton manufacturers and from other sources that the rates upon the lower class of cottons were such as to enable them to make a decent profit—but only a decent profit—and they were contented with it; but that the rates on the higher grades of cotton cloth, by reason of court decisions, had been reduced so that they were considerably below those of the cheaper grades of cotton cloth, and that by undervaluations and otherwise the whole cotton schedule had been made unjust and the various items were disproportionate in respect to the varying cloths. Hence, in the Senate a new system was introduced attempting to make the duties more specific rather than ad valorem, in order to prevent by judicial decision or otherwise a disproportionate and unequal operation of the schedule. Under this schedule it was contended that there had been a general rise of all the duties on cotton. This was vigorously denied by the experts of the Treasury Department. At last the Senate, in conference, consented to a reduction amounting to about 10 per cent on all the lower grades of cotton, and this reduced the lower grades of cotton substantially to the same rates as before and increased the higher grades to what they ought to be under the Dingley law and what they were intended to be. Now, I am not going into the question of evidence as to whether the cotton duties were too high and whether the difference between the cost of production abroad and at home, allowing for a reasonable profit to the manufacturer here, is less than the duties which are imposed under the Payne bill. It was a question of evidence which Congress passed upon, after they heard the statements of cotton manufacturers and such other evidence as they could avail themselves of. I agree that the method of taking evidence and the determination was made in a general way, and that there ought to be other methods of obtaining evidence and reaching a conclusion more satisfactory.

Criticism has also been made of the crockery schedule and the failure to reduce that. The question whether it ought to have been reduced or not was a question of evidence which both committees of Congress took up, and both concluded that the present rates on crockery were such as were needed to maintain the business in this country. I had been informed that the crockery schedule was not high enough, and mentioned that in one of my campaign speeches as a schedule probably where there ought to be some increases. It turned out that the difficulty was rather in undervaluations than in the character of the schedule itself, and so it was not changed. It is entirely possible to collect evidence to attack almost any of the schedules, but one story is good until another is told, and I have heard no reason for sustaining the contention that the crockery schedule is unduly high. So with respect to numerous details—items of not great importance—in which, upon what they regarded as sufficient evidence, the committee advanced the rates in order to save a business which was likely to be destroyed.

I have never known a subject that will evoke so much contradictory evidence as the question of tariff rates and the question of cost of production at home and abroad. Take the subject of paper. A committee was appointed by Congress a year before the tariff sittings began, to determine what the difference was between the cost of production in Canada of print paper and the cost of production here, and they reported that they thought that a good bill would be one imposing $2 a ton on paper, rather than $6, the Dingley rate, provided that Canada could be induced to take off the export duties and remove the other obstacles to the importation of spruce wood in this country out of which wood pulp is made. An examination of the evidence satisfied Mr. PAYNE—I believe it satisfied some of the Republican dissenters—that $2, unless some change was made in the Canadian restrictions upon the exports of wood to this country, was much too low, and that $4 was only a fair measure of the difference between the cost of production here and in Canada. In other words, the $2 found by the special committee in the House was rather an invitation to Canada and the Canadian print-paper people to use their influence with their government to remove the wood restrictions by reducing the duty on print paper against Canadian print-paper mills. It was rather a suggestion of a diplomatic nature than a positive statement of the difference in actual cost of production under existing conditions between Canada and the United States.

There are other subjects which I might take up. The tariff on hides was taken off because it was thought that it was not necessary in view of the high price of cattle thus to protect the man who raised them, and that the duty imposed was likely to throw the control of the sale of hides into the hands of the meat packers in Chicago. In order to balance the reduction on hides, however, there was a great reduction in shoes, from 25 to 10 per cent; on sole leather, from 20 to 5 per cent; on harness, from 45 to 20 per cent. So there was a reduction in the duty on coal of 33⅓ per cent. All countervailing duties were removed from oil, naphtha, gasoline, and its refined products. Lumber was reduced from $2 to $1.25; and these all on articles of prime necessity. It is said that there might have been more. But there were many business interests in the South, in Maine, along the border, and especially in the far Northwest, which insisted that it would give great advantage to Canadian lumber if the reduction were made more than 75 cents. Mr. Pinchot, the Chief Forester, thought that it would tend to make better lumber in this country if a duty were retained on it. The lumber interests thought that $2 was none too much, but the reduction was made and the compromise effected. Personally I was in favor of free lumber, because I did not think that if the tariff was taken off there would be much suffering among the lumber interests. But in the controversy the House and the Senate took a middle course, and who can say they were not justified?

With respect to the wool schedule, I agree that it is too high and that it ought to have been reduced, and that it probably represents considerably more than the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production here. The difficulty about the woolen schedule is that there were two contending factions early in the history of Republican tariffs, to wit, woolgrowers and the woolen manufacturers, and that finally, many years ago, they settled on a basis by which wool in the grease should have 11 cents a pound, and by which allowance should be made for the shrinkage of the washed wool in the differential upon woolen manufactures. The percentage of duty was very heavy—quite beyond the difference in the cost of production, which was not then regarded as a necessary or proper limitation upon protective duties.

When it came to the question of reducing the duty at this hearing in this tariff bill on wool, Mr. PAYNE, in the House, and Mr. Aldrich, in the Senate, although both favored reduction in the schedule, found that in the Republican Party the interests of the woolgrowers of the far West and the interests of the woolen manufacturers in the East and in other States, reflected through their representatives in Congress, was sufficiently strong to defeat any attempt to change the woolen tariff, and that had it been attempted it would have beaten the bill reported from either committee. I am sorry this is so, and I could wish that it had been otherwise. It is the one important defect in the present Payne tariff bill and in the performance of the promise of the platform to reduce rates to a difference in the cost of production, with reasonable profit to the manufacturer. That it will increase the price of woolen cloth or clothes, I very much doubt. There have been increases by the natural increase in the price of wool the world over as an agricultural product, but this was not due to the tariff, because the tariff was not changed. The increase would therefore have taken place whether the tariff would have been changed or not. The cost of woolen cloths behind the tariff wall, through the effect of competition, has been greatly less than the duty, if added to the price, would have made it.

There is a complaint now by the woolen clothiers and by the carded woolen people of this woolen schedule. They have honored me by asking in circulars sent out by them that certain questions be put to me in respect to it, and asking why I did not veto the bill, in view of the fact that the woolen schedule was not made in accord with the platform. I ought to say in respect to this point that all of them in previous tariff bills were strictly in favor of maintaining the woolen schedule as it was. The carded-woolen people are finding that carded wools are losing their sales because they are going out of style. People prefer worsteds. The clothing people who are doing so much circularizing were contented to let the woolen schedule remain as it was until very late in the tariff discussion, long after the bill had passed the House, and, indeed, they did not grow very urgent until the bill had passed the Senate. This was because they found that the price of woolen cloth was going up, and so they desired to secure reduction in the tariff, which would enable them to get cheaper material. They themselves are protected by a large duty, and I can not with deference to them ascribe their intense interest only to a deep sympathy with the ultimate consumers, so called. But, as I have already said, I am quite willing to admit that allowing the woolen schedule to remain where it is, is not a compliance with the terms of the platform as I interpret it and as it is generally understood.

On the whole, however, I am bound to say that I think the Payne tariff bill is the best tariff bill that the Republican Party ever passed; that in it the party has conceded the necessity for following the changed conditions and reducing tariff rates accordingly. This is a substantial achievement in the direction of lower tariffs and downward revision, and it ought to be accepted as such. Critics of the bill utterly ignore the very tremendous cuts that have been made in the iron schedule, which heretofore has been subject to criticism in all tariff bills. From iron ore, which was cut 75 per cent, to all the other items as low as 20 per cent, with an average of something like 40 or 50 per cent, that schedule has been reduced so that the danger of increasing prices through a monopoly of the business is very much lessened, and that was the chief purpose of revising the tariff downward under Republican protective principles. The severe critics of the bill pass this reduction in the metal schedule with a sneer, and say that the cut did not hurt the iron interests of the country. Well, of course it did not hurt them. It was not expected to hurt them. It was expected only to reduce excessive rates, so that business should still be conducted at a profit, and the very character of the criticism is an indication of the general injustice of the attitude of those who make it, in assuming that it was the promise of the Republican Party to hurt the industries of the country by the reductions which they were to make in the tariff, whereas it expressly indicated as plainly as possible in the platform that all of the industries were to be protected against injury by foreign competition, and the promise only went to the reduction of excessive rates beyond what was necessary to protect them.

The high cost of living, of which 50 per cent is consumed in food, 25 per cent in clothing, and 25 per cent in rent and fuel, has not been produced by the tariff, because the tariff has remained the same while the increases have gone on. It is due to the change of conditions the world over. Living has increased everywhere in cost—in countries where there is free trade and in countries where there is protection—and that increase has been chiefly seen in the cost of food products. In other words, we have had to pay more for the products of the farmer—for meat, for grain, for everything that enters into food. Now, certainly no one will contend that protection has increased the cost of food in this country, when the fact is that we have been the greatest exporters of food products in the world. It is only that the demand has increased beyond the supply, that farm lands have not been opened as rapidly as the population, and the demand has increased. I am not saying that the tariff does not increase prices in clothing and in building and in other items that enter into the necessities of life, but what I wish to emphasize is that the recent increases in the cost of living in this country have not been due to the tariff. We have a much higher standard of living in this country than they have abroad, and this has been made possible by higher income for the workingman, the farmer, and all classes. Higher wages have been made possible by the encouragement of diversified industries, built up and fostered by the tariff.

Now, the revision downward of the tariff that I have favored will not, I hope, destroy the industries of the country. Certainly it is not intended to. All that it is intended to do, and that is what I wish to repeat, is to put the tariff where it will protect industries here from foreign competition, but will not enable those who will wish to monopolize to raise prices by taking advantage of excessive rates beyond the normal difference in the cost of production.

If the country desires free trade, and the country desires a revenue tariff and wishes the manufacturers all over the country to go out of business, and to have cheaper prices at the expense of the sacrifice of many of our manufacturing interests, then it ought to say so and ought to put the Democratic Party in power if it thinks that party can be trusted to carry out any affirmative policy in favor of a revenue tariff. Certainly in the discussions in the Senate there was no great manifestation on the part of our Democratic friends in favor of reducing rates on necessities. They voted to maintain the tariff rates on everything that came from their particular sections. If we are to have free trade, certainly it can not be had through the maintenance of Republican majorities in the Senate and House and a Republican administration.

And now the question arises, what was the duty of a Member of Congress who believed in a downward revision greater than that which has been accomplished, who thought that the wool schedules ought to be reduced, and that perhaps there were other respects in which the bill could be improved? Was it his duty because, in his judgment, it did not fully and completely comply with the promises of the party platform as he interpreted it, and, indeed, as I had interpreted it, to vote against the bill? I am here to justify those who answer this question in the negative. Mr. Tawney was a downward revisionist like myself. He is a low-tariff man, and has been known to be such in Congress all the time he has been there. He is a prominent Republican, the head of the Appropriations Committee, and when a man votes as I think he ought to vote, and an opportunity such as this presents itself, I am glad to speak in behalf of what he did, not in defense of it, but in support of it.

This is a Government by a majority of the people. It is a representative Government. People select some 400 Members to constitute the lower House and some 92 Members to constitute the upper House through their legislatures, and the varying views of a majority of the voters in eighty or ninety millions of people are reduced to one resultant force to take affirmative steps in carrying on a government by a system of parties. Without parties popular government would be absolutely impossible. In a party, those who join it, if they would make it effective, must surrender their personal predilections on matters comparatively of less importance in order to accomplish the good which united action on the most important principles at issue secures.

Now, I am not here to criticize those Republican Members and Senators whose views on the subject of the tariff were so strong and intense that they believed it their duty to vote against their party on the tariff bill. It is a question for each man to settle for himself. The question is whether he shall help maintain the party solidarity for accomplishing its chief purposes, or whether the departure from principle in the bill as he regards it is so extreme that he must in conscience abandon the party. All I have to say is, in respect to Mr. Tawney's action, and in respect to my own in signing the bill, that I believed that the interests of the country, the interests of the party, required me to sacrifice the accomplishment of certain things in the revision of the tariff which I had hoped for, in order to maintain party solidarity, which I believe to be much more important than the reduction of rates in one or two schedules of the tariff. Had Mr. Tawney voted against the bill, and there had been others of the House sufficient in number to have defeated the bill, or if I had vetoed the bill because of the absence of a reduction of rates in the wool schedule, when there was a general downward revision, and a substantial one though not a complete one, we should have left the party in a condition of demoralization that would have prevented the accomplishment of purposes and a fulfillment of other promises which we had made just as solemnly as we had entered into that with respect to the tariff. When I could say without hesitation that this is the best tariff bill that the Republican Party has ever passed, and therefore the best tariff bill that has been passed at all, I do not feel that I could have reconciled any other course to my conscience than that of signing the bill, and I think Mr. Tawney feels the same way. Of course if I had vetoed the bill I would have received the applause of many Republicans who may be called low-tariff Republicans, and who think deeply on that subject, and of all the Democracy. Our friends the Democrats would have applauded, and then laughed in their sleeve at the condition in which the party would have been left; but, more than this, and waiving considerations of party, where would the country have been had the bill been vetoed or been lost by a vote? It would have left the question of the revision of the tariff open for further discussion during the next session. It would have suspended the settlement of all our business down to a known basis upon which prosperity could proceed and investments be made, and it would have held up the coming of prosperity to this country certainly for a year and probably longer. These are the reasons why Mr. Tawney voted for the bill. These are the reasons why I signed it.

But there are additional reasons why the bill ought not to have been beaten. It contained provisions of the utmost importance in the interest of this country in dealing with foreign countries and in the supplying of a deficit which under the Dingley bill seemed inevitable. There has been a disposition in some foreign countries taking advantage of greater elasticity in their systems of imposing tariffs and of making regulations to exclude our products and exercise against us undue discrimination. Against these things we have been helpless, because it required an act of Congress to meet the difficulties. It is now proposed, by what is called the maximum and minimum clause, to enable the President to allow to come into operation a maximum or penalizing increase of duties over the normal or minimum duties whenever in his opinion the conduct of the foreign countries has been unduly discriminatory against the United States. It is hoped that very little use may be required of this clause, but its presence in the law and the power conferred upon the Executive, it is thought, will prevent in the future such undue discriminations. Certainly this is most important to our exporters of agricultural products and manufactures.

Second. We have imposed an excise tax upon corporations measured by 1 per cent upon the net income of all corporations except fraternal and charitable corporations after exempting $5,000. This, it is thought, will raise an income of twenty-six to thirty millions of dollars, will supply the deficit which otherwise might arise without it, and will bring under Federal supervision more or less all the corporations of the country. The inquisitorial provisions of the act are mild but effective, and certainly we may look not only for a revenue but for some most interesting statistics and the means of obtaining supervision over corporate methods that has heretofore not obtained.

Then, we have finally done justice to the Philippines. We have introduced free trade between the Philippines and the United States, and we have limited the amount of sugar and the amount of tobacco and cigars that can be introduced from the Philippines to such a figure as shall greatly profit the Philippines and yet in no way disturb the products of the United States or interfere with those engeged in the tobacco or sugar interests here. These features of the bill were most important, and the question was whether they were to be sacrificed because the bill did not in respect to wool and woolens and in some few other matters meet our expectations. I do not hesitate to repeat that I think it would have been an unwise sacrifice of the business interests of the country, it would have been an unwise sacrifice of the solidarity, efficiency, and promise-performing power of the party, to have projected into the next session another long discussion of the tariff, and to have delayed or probably defeated the legislation needed in the improvement of our interstate commerce regulation, and in making more efficient our antitrust law and the prosecutions under it. Such legislation is needed to clinch the Roosevelt policies, by which corporations and those in control of them shall be limited to a lawful path and shall be prevented from returning to those abuses which a recurrence of prosperity is too apt to bring about unless definite, positive steps of a legislative character are taken to mark the lines of honest and lawful corporate management.

Now, there is another provision in the new tariff bill that I regard as of the utmost importance. It is a provision which appropriates $75,000 for the President to employ persons to assist him in the execution of the maximum and minimum tariff clause and in the administration of the tariff law. Under that authority I conceive that the President has the right to appoint a board, as I have appointed it, who shall associate with themselves, and have under their control, a number of experts who shall address themselves, first, to the operation of foreign tariffs upon the exports of the United States, and then to the operation of the United States tariff upon imports and exports. There are provisions in the general tariff procedure for the ascertainment of the cost of production of articles abroad and the cost of production of articles here. I intend to direct the board, in the course of these duties and in carrying them out, in order to assist me in the administration of the law, to make what might be called a glossary of the tariff, or a small encyclopedia of the tariff, or something to be compared to the United States Pharmacopœia with reference to information as to drugs and medicines. I conceive that such a board may very properly, in the course of their duties, take up separately all the items of the tariff, both those on the free list and those which are dutiable, describe what they are, where they are manufactured, what their uses are, the methods of manufacture, the quantity of the manufacture, the cost of production abroad and here, and every other fact with respect to each item which would enable the Executive to understand the operation of the tariff, the value of the article, and the amount of duty imposed, and all those details which the student of every tariff law finds it so difficult to discover. I do not intend, unless compelled or directed by Congress, to publish the result of these investigations, but to treat them merely as incidental facts brought out officially from time to time, and as they may be ascertained and put of record in the department, there to be used when they have all been accumulated and are sufficiently complete to justify executive recommendation based on them. Now I think it is utterly useless, as I think it would be greatly distressing to business, to talk of another revision of the tariff during the present Congress. I should think that it would certainly take the rest of this administration to accumulate the data upon which a new and proper revision of the tariff might be had. By that time the whole Republican Party can express itself again in respect to the matter and bring to bear upon its Representatives in Congress that sort of public opinion which shall result in solid party action. I am glad to see that a number of those who thought it their duty to vote against the bill insist that they are still Republicans and intend to carry on their battle in favor of lower duties and a lower revision within the lines of the party. That is their right and, in their view of things, is their duty.

It is vastly better that they should seek action of the party than that they should break off from it and seek to organize another party, which would probably not result in accomplishing anything more than merely defeating our party and inviting in the opposing party, which does not believe, or says that it does not believe, in protection. I think that we ought to give the present bill a chance. After it has been operating for two or three years we can tell much more accurately than we can to-day its effect upon the industries of the country and the necessity for any amendment in its provisions.

I have tried to state as strongly as I can, but not more strongly than I think the facts justify, the importance of not disturbing the business interests of this country by an attempt in this Congress or the next to make a new revision; but meantime I intend, so far as in me lies, to secure official data upon the operation of the tariff, from which, when a new revision is attempted, exact facts can be secured.

I have appointed a Tariff Board that has no brief for either side in respect to what the rates shall be. I hope they will make their observations and note their data in their record with exactly the same impartiality and freedom from anxiety as to result with which the Weather Bureau records the action of the elements or any scientific bureau of the Government records the results of its impartial investigations. Certainly the experience in this tariff justifies the statement that no revision should hereafter be attempted in which more satisfactory evidence of an impartial character is not secured.

I am sorry that I am not able to go into further detail with respect to the tariff bill, but I have neither the information nor the time in which to do it. I have simply stated the case as it seemed to Mr. Tawney in his vote and as it seemed to me in my signing the bill.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. THISTLEWOOD for 10 days, on account of sickness in family.

WATERWAYS.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a correction in the RECORD. In the RECORD of August 16, 1911, there was published a document on waterways as creators of prosperity. Some very valuable diagrams should have been attached to the document, and they are necessary to make it understandable. I wish to have the whole thing reproduced, because it does not make sense as it is at present in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD certain documents.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to any more unanimous-consent requests to-night.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until Friday, August 18, 1911, at 12 o'clock m.

IMPROVEMENT OF BLACK WARRIOR RIVER, ALA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 943) to improve navigation on Black Warrior River, in the State of Alabama, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to change the detailed plans and specifications for the construction of Lock and Dam 17, on the Black Warrior River, Ala., so as to increase the height of the pool level over the dam crest of Lock 17 to a height of 63 feet above the pool level of Lock 16, so as to render unnecessary the building of Locks 18 and 19, as now authorized, and so as to provide for the extension of slack water up the Mulberry and Locust Forks of the Black Warrior River to Sanders Shoals and Nichols Shoals, respectively, and for the development of water power.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to have prepared such detailed plans and estimates as may be necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act, and he is further authorized in his discretion to suspend operations during his investigations and to enter into supplemental agreements with the present contractors for Lock and Dam 17, providing for the annulment of existing contracts or for their modification so as to cover the work required for the construction of the higher lock and dam, as he may deem most advantageous for the interests of the United States.

SEC. 3. That should the construction of the higher dam at site 17 be found advisable the appropriations and authorizations heretofore made for the cost of locks and dams on the Black Warrior, Warrior, and Tombigbee Rivers, Ala., shall be available for the construction of Dam 17 and such locks as may be necessary to overcome the lift between the pools created by Dams 16 and 17.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War is authorized and empowered to enter into a contract with the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co. (hereinafter styled "the company"), a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Alabama, its successors and assigns, for the purpose of carrying out the stipulations and performances herein mentioned. It shall be provided in said contract that the company, its successors and assigns, shall have the right to construct, maintain, own, and operate, at its own cost, in connection with Dams and Locks 16 and 17, for a period of 25 years from the time fixed in this act for completion of the works herein authorized, electrical power stations and other structures for the development of water power for industrial and other purposes, and for converting to its own use, benefit, and profit the power developed with the surplus water not needed for lockage, including the right to sell, lease, or otherwise dispose of said power: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall have the power to fix and regulate, from time to time, the rates which the said company may charge consumers for light, heat, and power: And provided, That the company shall furnish and deliver, free of charge to the Government, at Locks 16 and 17, all power necessary for the lighting and operation of said locks and for the lighting of the Government grounds and houses situated at said locks and dams: And provided further, That said company shall only sell light, heat, and power developed from said water power direct to the consumer. The said contract shall further provide for the payment by the company to the Government of an annual rental for its use of the water power developed at Dams 16 and 17. For a period of 20 years the rental shall be at the rate of not less than $1 per annum per horsepower developed, which rate shall be subject to be changed and fixed in his discretion by the Secretary of War at the end of that period and thereafter at the end of every 10-year period. Payment for the power developed at each dam shall begin one year after the locks and dam at 17 shall have been completed. Beginning with the year 1920, the minimum rental to be paid to the Government by the company shall be on the basis of 15,000 horsepower. The company shall have ingress and egress over Government lands for the construction and operation of its plants and works and the right to use Government lands at or near said locks for the erecting of power houses and appurtenances in connection therewith, subject to approval and regulation by the Secretary of War. It shall be provided further in the contract that the company shall transfer to the Government flowage rights over all lands that will be temporarily or permanently overflowed by reason or in connection with the construction or improvement of Lock and Dam 17. The Government shall have free access to all the books of the company and all other records necessary for ascertaining and calculating the price, rates, and amount of power produced, developed, or sold by the company at said locks and at its storage reservoir. The contract shall further provide that the works herein contemplated, except the storage reservoir at or near Sanders Shoals, on the Mulberry Fork of the Black Warrior River, shall be commenced within one year and that the power-house foundations to be constructed by the company as a part of the dam shall be completed at least as soon as Dam 17. The said company is hereby authorized to construct said storage dam and reservoir at Sanders Shoals in accordance with the act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters, as amended by the act of June 23, 1910: Provided, That the construction of said dam and reservoir shall be commenced within 1 year after the completion of Dam 17, and shall be completed within 10 years from the date of approval of this act.

SEC. 5. That in the exercise of the authority granted to the company herein or by said contract the company shall conform to such regulations as may be imposed by the Secretary of War for the protection of navigation and of the property and other interests of the United States. The company shall at no time lower the pool level made by the erection of Dam 16, nor the pool level of Dam 17 below 63 feet above the crest of Dam 16, but in order to create a storage surplus for water-power purposes the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, permit flashboards or a removable crest not exceeding 3 feet in height to be installed on Dam 17 by the company, at its own expense; the United States shall not be liable to said company for any failure of water power from any cause whatsoever. The work and improvements herein provided for shall be executed under the direction and with the approval of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, the structures provided for being always subject to the provisions and requirements of this act and to such stipulations as may be imposed by Congress or by the Secretary of War for the protection of navigation and property and other interests of the United States. To insure the performance by the company of the acts and obligations imposed upon it by said contract, the Secretary of War may require the company to execute a bond in such an amount and with such surety as he may determine to be necessary. Whenever the company shall have acquired and transferred to the United States Government flowage rights over all lands to be flooded and temporarily or permanently overflowed, and shall have erected power stations sufficient to supply the Government with all necessary power to light and operate said locks, said bond may be reduced to an amount not to exceed $50,000.

SEC. 6. That nothing shall be done in the use of the water from said dam or otherwise to interfere with or in any way impede or retard the operations of said locks or the proper and complete navigation of the river at all times, nor in any way to interfere with the use and control of the same by the United States Government or the maintenance of the water surface above the dam at the established minimum pool level; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to prescribe regulations to govern the use of said water power and the operations of the plants and force employed in connection therewith, so far as the same applies to the operation of the locks.

SEC. 7. All repairs, renewals, and other necessary expenditures upon the works, which the company shall be allowed to construct exclusively for the use of power generation, shall be made by the company, so that their condition shall at no time interfere with the interests of navigation: Provided, That whenever in the opinion of the Secretary of War the condition of said works endangers the interests of navigation he shall notify the said company to repair the same, and if the company shall not immediately comply with the demand of the Secretary of War to make such repairs, he is hereby authorized and empowered to enter upon such works and cause them to be repaired; and the expense thereof shall constitute a debt against said company, its successors or assigns, and a lien upon all its property.

SEC. 8. The determination by the Secretary of War of the amount of rendal due the Government from the company at any time shall be conclusive and binding on the company; and if the company at any time fails to pay to the Government the amount of rental due, within a time to be fixed by the Secretary of War, or fails to comply with any of the provisions of this act on its part to be complied with, or fails to comply with any of the provisions of the contract on its part to be complied with, or fails to comply with any regulations or directions which the Secretary of War may lawfully make or give, or fails to observe the charges for the sale, lease, or other disposition of its power which may be prescribed from time to time by the Secretary of War, then the rights hereby granted shall become null and void as to the company and shall become thereby vested in the United States. At the end of the period of 50 years, hereinabove provided for, all rights, interests, and property of the company acquired under or by virtue of this act shall pass at once absolutely to the Government, unless Congress otherwise provides. Before this Act shall take effect as to the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co., the Secretary of War shall, in a public manner, advertise for and receive bids from persons or corporations who may desire to be substituted for the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co. as the beneficiary of this act, and if any person or company shall, in making a bid, offer better terms for the Government than are herein provided for to be received from the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co., then the Secretary of War shall accept the best bid offered, and thereupon such best bidder shall in all respects as to this act be substituted in place of the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co. if such best bid be not made by that company, in which case the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co. shall not have or receive any right, title, or interest under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved, and the United States shall incur no liability for the alteration, amendment, or repeal thereof to the owner, owners, or any other persons interested in any dam or other structures which shall have been constructed in accordance with its provisions at or in connection with Dams Nos. 16 and 17.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, yesterday, when this bill was messaged over from the House, I submitted a motion that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, from which it was reported to the Senate. The RECORD discloses that the bill as passed by the Senate was amended in the House committee by striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting an entirely new bill. The bill as thus amended and reported by that committee was radically changed by amendments adopted during its consideration in the House.

I have had no opportunity to make such an examination of the amendments made to the bill in the House of Representatives as will enable me to discuss them intelligently at this time. I am advised, however, that the bill will confer upon a private corporation great advantages; that it proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to make this contract for a period of 30 years at rates which are preposterously low. The bill in its present form has had no consideration by this body. It has never been considered in its present form by a Senate committee. It ought not to be sent to conference without thorough consideration by the Senate Committee on Commerce. It is a measure of too great importance to dispose of it in conference in the closing hours of this session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the recollection of the Chair that the Senator from Wisconsin made a motion for reference, but the Chair does not find it in the RECORD.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I distinctly remember having made the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I find a number of remarkable interpolations in the RECORD this morning, and some very notable omissions.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. The Senator from Wisconsin is correct about it. He made the motion yesterday.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am certain that I made the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin desires to make the motion now, anyway, the Chair understands.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do. I renew that motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator renews the motion, which saves the trouble of looking to find it in the record of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] says that my motion to refer this bill to the Committee on Commerce carried yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the motion was not put. At the request of the Chair the matter was laid aside until some other matter was disposed of.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was under the impression that it went to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it was some other matter.

Mr. NELSON. The motion was never put.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair asked the Senator from Minnesota if he was entirely willing that the matter should remain on the table. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to refer the bill with the House amendment to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not a motion to nonconcur in the House amendment and request a conference take precedence of a motion to commit the bill to the Committee on Commerce?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks the motion to refer would take precedence.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is that motion debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, this bill was reported from the Commerce Committee of the Senate and passed. It went over to the House, and under conditions there it was doubtful whether the bill would be considered. But the Chief of Engineers and the Board of Engineers, to whom the bill had been submitted, reported that its passage was an emergency; that unless it should pass in some form, so as to authorize the Secretary of War to change the plans heretofore adopted and under which the contract had been let for the erection of one of the dams, the work would be indefinitely delayed; and that if it should be prosecuted under the contract, a very valuable water power would be permanently destroyed.

I want to say to the Senate that I have no interest whatever in this power proposition, except that I should regret very much to see that work prosecuted under the plan now being carried forward, the result of which would be the permanent destruction of this power.

I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin and to the Senate that if the bill shall go to conference, it is agreed that all reference to power in the bill will be stricken out and only the first three sections of the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The first three sections of the bill only authorize the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to change the plans that have been formally adopted for the improvement of the river. The last river and harbor act contained a provision authorizing the Secretary of War to construct three dams and appropriating the money therefor. Under that act one of the dams was let to contract and the contractor is at work upon it, and unless this bill is passed he must necessarily go forward under that contract and under the law to the completion of the dam, to the utter destruction of the power at that point.

Another reason, Mr. President, why the Secretary of War and the engineers recommend this change is, that it is a great saving to the Government. Instead of building three locks and dams at the estimated cost, they propose to build one lock and dam at what is known as No. 17. Instead of building a low dam there for the purpose of navigation only, and building the other low dams for the purpose of navigation only, they report that, if they had authority to change their plans and to make a supplemental contract for the construction of a 63-foot dam at Lock 17, that would supersede the necessity of these other two locks. Not only that, but they would supersede the necessity of two other locks in the forks of this river, which must follow and which have been recommended by the engineers.

So it is, Mr. President, that if the first three sections of the bill, which make no reference to water power whatever, shall pass, this one dam and lock—it will require two locks—will supersede four other dams; in other words, instead of building five dams, three of which have been authorized and the money appropriated for them, the other two having been recommended by the engineers and will be appropriated for, this one dam completes that whole project to its final conclusion and saves to the Government, according to the estimate of the engineers, two hundred and fifty or three hundred thousand dollars and about four and one-half or five years of time, for the Senate will at once understand that they can build this one dam much quicker than they can build five dams, because a foundation would be required for each of these dams.

Not only that, Mr. President, but we get rid of a very large annual expense in the way of maintenance. Instead of having five lockages on this river to complete it, we shall have only one, thereby avoiding the necessity of keeping employees and all of the other necessary attachments at this dam for lockage purposes.

As I have said, I do not believe, if the Senator from Wisconsin will read the first two sections of this bill, he can have any objection to it. It is purely a navigation proposition. This dam is to be constructed according to plans that will make it possible in the future at some time—I do not know when—to develop and utilize this water power. That is all there is to the bill.

We have been hearing much, Mr. President, about the conservation of natural resources. Here is an opportunity to do that; here is an opportunity to complete this river within two years, and to complete the system at a much less cost than the original plan, simply by authorizing the Secretary of War to construct this one dam 63 feet high, with a view hereafter, if deemed advisable, to develop this water power. I hope, under these circumstances, the proposition will be acceded to.

I assure the Senator from Wisconsin that when the conference report comes back to the Senate, if this proposition for the development of water power will be eliminated, we shall have a simple proposition here for navigation, with the possibility retained at some future time to develop the water power, instead of going along now with the present plan and utterly destroying the water power for all future time. I hope the bill may go to conference.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, this bill was so amended by the other House as to provide a leasing system, as it were, for power which is to be created.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is true, I think.

Mr. BORAH. And the fixing of rates, and so forth.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that the bill as it passed the Senate, if I remember correctly, did not provide for any such thing.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, yes; it did.

Mr. BORAH. Did the bill, as it passed the Senate, provide for the leasing of power?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, if the proposition for the National Government to lease these power sites and to fix rates within the States is going to be settled, it ought to be opened at the beginning of a session and not at the close, for it will take a long time to pass that kind of a bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that is exactly my purpose in eliminating everything from this bill that has reference to power. The bill would come back here with every provision in it to provide for the leasing of power and the regulation of power, and all questions pertaining to power eliminated.

I think I understand, Mr. President, the importance of this great question, and I now concede that it is of the highest importance that Congress should, at an early day, take up this question and work out some systematic plan for the improvement of navigable rivers, so that water powers may be developed and that it should be uniform in its character. For that reason I shall insist, and those who have been instrumental in bringing this bill forward agree, that all reference to power shall be stricken from it. We propose to leave it purely as a navigation proposition, looking to the completion of navigation on that river. I hope the conferees may have an opportunity to present that question as I have indicated it to the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President, I only want to add to what my colleague has so well said, that there was no debate in the House of Representatives on the navigation features of this bill. That part of the bill was accepted practically as the Senate passed it. It involved the authority conferred upon the Secretary of War to change the plans there, which would save about seven or eight years' time in completing the work of improving navigation on the river, and would save the Government some $250,000 or $300,000 in the cost of its completion. Instead of four dams, one high dam is to be built to back the water up the river for 45 miles, with a depth of 7 feet. It backs it up into a territory where coal mines have been developed, from which the engineers now report that there have been taken out 6,000,000 tons of coal a year, and that the supply is available at that rate for 850 years.

We are very anxious to complete the improvement of navigation on the river. It would be of immense benefit to the coal fields and to the iron and other manufacturing industries in the Birmingham district. When the work is completed as contemplated in the first three sections of the amendment, it will back the water up to the railroad where it passes over the river, so that freight from Birmingham can be lowered into barges and carried to the Gulf at a very small cost. It will reduce the cost of transportation of coal to Mobile nearly $1 a ton, and about the same to New Orleans—more than half the value of the transportation.

It is our purpose, in order to avoid the debate that will necessarily arise over the matter of water powers, the compensation to be paid therefor, and the right of the Government to take any compensation, to eliminate in conference those provisions from this bill and to leave only the navigation features. It will be a great benefit to our State and to our district and to other States.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Does the Senator desire to ask any question?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if it is to be understood that the conference report is to eliminate all questions except that of navigation, I should not object to the bill going to conference, but if these other questions are to arise——

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. It is our purpose, I want to say to the Senator from Idaho, to eliminate those features.

Mr. BORAH. If the interests of private corporations and the question of leasing power generally are to be incorporated in this bill, I should prefer to have it go to a committee. If it is, however, to be confined in its terms as it shall be reported by the conference committee, so that it will operate with reference to the one question alone of navigation, I should be perfectly willing to see it go to conference; but I would want it understood that these other questions are to be eliminated.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. They are to be eliminated.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I can assure the Senator from Idaho that if this bill goes to conference it will never come back here with anything in it except the first three sections, which provide solely for navigation. The remainder of the bill will be eliminated in conference.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. Does the Senator refer to the three sections as contained in the original bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No, sir; the first three sections as contained in the amendment of the House of Representatives. I should like to have the Secretary read them for the information of the Senate. They are very short.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to change the detailed plans and specifications for the construction of Lock and Dam 17, on the Black Warrior River, Ala., so as to increase the height of the pool level over the dam crest of Lock 17 to a height of 63 feet above the pool level of Lock 16, so as to render unnecessary the building of Locks 18 and 19, as now authorized, and so as to provide for the extension of slack water up the Mulberry and Locust Forks of the Black Warrior River to Sanders Shoals and Nichols Shoals, respectively, and for the development of water power.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to have prepared such detailed plans and estimates as may be necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act, and he is further authorized, in its discretion, to suspend operations during his investigations and to enter into supplemental agreements with the present contractors for Lock and Dam 17, providing for the annulment of existing contracts or for their modification so as to cover the work required for the construction of the higher lock and dam, as he may deem most advantageous for the interests of the United States.

SEC. 3. Should the construction of the higher dam at site 17 be found advisable, the appropriations and authorizations heretofore made for the cost of locks and dams on the Black Warrior, Warrior, and Tombigbee Rivers, Ala., shall be available for the construction of Dam 17 and such locks as may be necessary to overcome the lift between the pools created by Dams 16 and 17.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have been endeavoring, as best I could at my desk, to examine the report of the Secretary of War, the original bill, and the various amendments. It appears that this bill, as introduced in the Senate, proposed in its first section to change the plans for improving the Black Warrior River and at the same time to develop water power "in cooperation with the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co." As originally introduced it did not propose an open leasing plan, where different electric lighting companies could bid for the power created incidentally by the improvement of the river, but that it was proposed to open the way for the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co. to get the contract from the Government.

As originally introduced there were some 10 sections in the bill. The first three sections provided for changing the plan of construction, but the great bulk of that bill and the manifest purpose that lay back of it was serving the interests of this electric light and power company by enabling them to get favorable terms from the Government, to the exclusion of all competitors, in acquiring the control of this power.

Mr. President, I have a memorandum, which has been given me by Mr. KENT, a Member of the House of Representatives, who has examined the bills and the papers and who followed the debate; and I am led to conclude, from a very hasty reading of this memorandum at my desk this morning, that there is perhaps no reason to oppose changing of the plan of improving the Black Warrior River. I want to ask the Senator from Alabama whether the Secretary of War has recommended this change in the plan——

Mr. BANKHEAD. He has.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And whether it is stated by the Secretary that it will work a substantial saving to the Government to construct the one dam at Lock No. 17 instead of constructing the several dams provided for in the earlier plan?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is their report. They make that statement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On all the information I have up to the present time I can see no objection to the passing of the first three sections of the bill as it came from the House, and upon the assurance of those in charge of the bill, who expect to be on the conference committee, that the Senate conferees will not agree to report in favor of enacting more than the three first sections of the bill, I will withdraw my motion and consent that it may go to conference.

Mr. NELSON. That is the purpose. I shall ask the Chair to appoint the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and myself on the committee. I feel about the question just as the Senator from Alabama does. I concur in his views on that subject.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. I am strongly in favor of establishing some general rule in regard to all these grants of water power. The usual custom has been to specify a particular company and grant to it the right to use the power developed in a stream. That has been regarded as necessary, because there was such a degree of detail, and the grantee would necessarily expend large sums of money in connection with the amount expended by the Government. Whenever a case arises, however, in which it can be submitted to competitive bids, I think it should be done.

Mr. President, I regard it as out of the question at this stage in the session to do more than to consider the first three sections. I think we should give very careful consideration to the other propositions coming from the House, and I do not think it possible to conclude our deliberations upon them before adjournment.

Another question arises. I should most decidedly take issue with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in regard to the right of the Government to charge a rental wherever power is created by Government dams constructed for the purpose of navigation. If the Government constructs dams in a river, whatever the original object be, whether it be for navigation or any other reason, the power created ought not to be given away; a fair compensation should be paid for it. That has been the custom for a number of years. I want to say in this connection that I think in some instances the compensation has been altogether inadequate.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho has not yet defined his position upon that proposition.

Mr. BURTON. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. BORAH. I will say it is one of great importance, and before a proposition is adopted providing for a general leasing system, which has been promulgated by some people who have studied this question, I want it discussed pretty thoroughly.

Mr. BAILEY. Would the Senator from Idaho or the Senator from Ohio, either, oblige me by telling me how the Federal Government has acquired the power to lease these waters within a State unless and except so far as they relate to navigation?

Mr. BORAH. I think no one who is familiar with the Constitution contends for anything other than what the Senator from Texas does.

Mr. BAILEY. I am very glad to know that the Senator from Idaho does not, because, without having examined it carefully, I should distrust my own opinion if he differed with me. But the learned Senator from Ohio seems to assume that power in the Federal Government.

However, I do not desire to delay this bill which, under the statement of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]—and that is enough for all of us—does not involve that question; but I think it will take a long time to settle it as the Senator from Ohio suggests. I hope he will bring it in in the first part of some long session.

Mr. BORAH. I did not understand that the Senator from Ohio took that position.

Mr. BAILEY. He did say, as I understood him, that there ought to be a system under which the Government should make these leases and under which it should have a larger revenue than it has heretofore derived from it.

Mr. BURTON. Does the Senator from Texas deny the right of the General Government, when it has constructed dams for the purpose of aiding navigation, and those dams create a water power, to lease that water power and to charge for it?

Mr. BAILEY. I do, unqualifiedly. I deny that the Federal Government has any right over or concerning any stream in any State of this Union further than is necessary to remove obstructions to interstate and foreign commerce, and probably we must now go so far as to say that it has the jurisdiction to create facilities for interstate and foreign commerce. But it has no more title to the water that flows through these States than I have, and if it acquire the land on which it constructs a dam, that probably raises a different question. It then may possess a proprietor's right, but it certainly does not even then possess a sovereign right.

How far the Government, owning the dam or the water, succeeding to the riparian owner's rights, may then dispose of it, probably is another question. But that question, I take it, is not involved in all these cases.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. I beg pardon of the Senator from Alabama and the Senators from Idaho and Ohio.

I merely did not want to see that question passed as if it were not contested, and I was unfortunate enough not to exactly understand that the Senator from Idaho did question it. If I had understood his position, I would not have even interposed with this inquiry.

Mr. BURTON. The question of the right to construct dams for the creation of water power as an independent proposition is not involved here.

Mr. BAILEY. No. We ought to pass this.

Mr. BURTON. But if, when that water power is created as an incident in the construction of navigation works, anyone denies the right to make a charge for such power, he denies the existence of a right which the Government in numerous places has been exercising for years.

Mr. BAILEY. It has no more right to do it than I have.

Mr. BURTON. It is a right which has been exercised in many of the States and which has been sanctioned by the Supreme Court of the United States. I am quite well satisfied I can convince the Senator from Texas that this view is correct.

Mr. BAILEY. The Supreme Court of the United States itself could not convince me of that, if it should decide it and repeat the decision, because I know perfectly well that the power of the General Government over the streams is a commerce power and that commerce power relates only to the right of navigation.

Mr. BORAH. When the Senator from Ohio says it has been sanctioned by the Supreme Court of the United States, he does not mean to say that the Supreme Court has decided that question?

Mr. BURTON. The Supreme Court has decided that where, as an incident in the exercise of another right, water power is created, that water power may be sold and charged for.

Mr. BAILEY. This Republic will have to be older and there will have to be several successions to the Supreme Court before I would ever believe that that ought to be the law. But I have never had occasion to examine it; I do not live where these questions arise, and my interest in it is merely general or, it might be said, a theoretical one.

I shall ask the Senator from Ohio, not on the floor, because that might assume he could not produce the decisions—and I am sure he thinks he can—but after this matter is disposed of I shall ask him for the decisions that hold that the Government of the United States, which possesses a mere easement in these waters, may sell what belongs to the States or to the riparian owners.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, upon the assurance which has been made to the Senate that the limit of this legislation, as reported from conference, will not extend beyond the first three sections of the House bill, I withdraw the motion I made to commit it to the committee again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin withdraws his motion.

Mr. KERN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Alabama whether this abandonment of the matters referred to in the sections succeeding section 3 is a mere temporary abandonment, or whether this scheme, which is outlined in the sections succeeding section 3, is to be renewed at some future time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I could not answer that question. My idea is that the Congress will take up this question generally very soon, and we ought to work out some plan, some policy that is uniform. I could not say that Congress will not at some future time undertake to legislate with reference to the development of this power. I believe it will, some time in the future. I believe it ought to. But I do not believe it ought to do it now.

Therefore I assure the Senate that, as far as I can control it, if this bill goes to conference, only the first three sections of the bill will come back to the Senate, and we will leave open the question as to what Congress may do in the future.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Alabama. In case the Congress later takes up this matter of disposing of the power created by this dam, is there any other company except the company named heretofore in this bill which can become a bidder for that power?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, I think anybody can take it up, perhaps. Of course that whole question is eliminated here. There is no bidding: there is no leasing; there is no attempt in any way in this bill to control that power or to dispose of it. That is left for the future.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The question of the Senator from Indiana was directed to ascertaining whether this bill now, as proposed, confining it to three sections, might be possibly a preliminary step to another attempt to transfer to this company the power which the Government proposes to create; and what I wanted to learn was whether, if the power is to be disposed of as the Senator indicates, it must necessarily be disposed of to this company——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Or whether other companies might be in the market to secure it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course, when Congress comes to deal with this question, as the House has already indicated, it will be put up to the highest bidder, or there will have to be compliance with any other arrangement or any other condition that may be imposed by Congress, which, of course, will be ample.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that was one of the vices of this bill, that it did not give other companies an opportunity to secure the power.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Our anxiety is to have this improvement completed as a navigation proposition, and our idea is to save four or five years, and to save considerable sums in money.

The money for this has already been appropriated. The purpose is to get these three sections out of conference. The Board of Engineers and the Chief of Engineers are in perfect accord and recommend these three sections, in order to facilitate this work; and then whatever Congress may do in the future with reference to power will be as applicable to this bill as to any other bill.

I anticipate that the importance of this question in the near future, and the public demand will compel Congress to take up seriously and undertake to reach some conclusion with reference to this great question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is beyond question that this subject will again appear in Congress.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope so.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In anticipation of that, if it is found to be within the rules, I suggest that the conferees attach to the bill as perfected in conference a direction or request to the Secretary of War to report what electricity will be generated by this improvement, or report an estimate of the amount of electricity that will be generated and the selling value of that electricity.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We already have a report from the Secretary of War as to the amount of current to be developed here. That is in the report—the horsepower.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The amount that would be developed by the erection of this particular dam at Lock No. 17?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; Locks Nos. 17 and 16. It is a very small amount. The power to be created here, if there is to be power, is to be produced by the storage dam at the head of navigation, with which the Government has nothing to do except to supervise it. There is where the power is to come from.

They propose at the head of navigation of this river or above navigation, to erect at their own expense a dam 100 feet high, and there to impound the waters in a reservoir covering 30,000 acres perhaps, and from that reservoir they propose to get their power mainly. There is very little power to be created at these dams.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. How much power is it estimated by the Secretary of War will be created by the improvements which it is proposed to make?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under these three sections?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Under these three sections of this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. They report that perhaps 5,000 horsepower may be produced. That is doubtful—5,000 horsepower. It is very small.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My recollection, from a hasty reading of the bill, was that it was something like three times that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No. If the Senator from Wisconsin will examine the report and the arguments in the House he will find that that mainly is to be created from the reservoir dam, not from the dams at all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not had an opportunity to read the entire bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. NELSON, Mr. BURTON, and Mr. BANKHEAD.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. COTTON CROP STATISTICS.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, a few days ago I introduced a resolution (S. Res. 135) asking the Secretary of Agriculture to give some detailed information as to the methods of gathering the report on the condition of the cotton crop and the preliminary estimate made upon this report as to the probable yield. There was some objection raised in the Senate to the immediate consideration of it, and on account of some further objections from other soruces I allowed it to lie on the table.

I have prepared a resolution (S. Res. 140) this morning based upon some facts which I have obtained, and which I desire to have read, in order to explain the necessity for some immediate action along this line. I wish to notice a paragraph from the report emanating from the Agriculture Department.

It states that the condition of the growing cotton crop was, on June 25, 88.2 per cent, against a 10-years' average of 80 per cent, and that there were 34,000,000 acres this year that would probably be harvested, against about 32,000,000 acres last year, and they estimate, on June 25, that the probable yield of cotton would be 14,500,000 bales, at least 3,000,000 bales more than were made the year previous, and certainly 2,000,000 bales more than have ever been made in the history of the cotton belt.

On account of the condition of weather that has prevailed throughout the South and on account of the wide protest which has come in against the Government issuing any preliminary statement as to the yield until the crop has been practically ginned I introduced the resolution not for the purpose of discrediting the Agricultural Department, but for the purpose of giving that department the opportunity of showing to the public plainly and above board just the methods employed and the persons employed in arriving at this conclusion.

In order to fortify myself thoroughly as to whether the Government should be given an opportunity to explain the statement regarding this great industry, affecting 11 of the States of this Union and upon which depends the balance of trade in America, I got a Senator from each of the cotton-growing States to wire to the commissioner of agriculture of his State as to the condition and prospective yield. I wish to have the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] just here, because I want him to understand it thoroughly, as he is the one who made the objection to the resolution, together with the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

As I said, I got a Senator from each of the cotton-growing States to wire his commissioner of agriculture to suggest what were the conditions obtaining in the cotton crop in the several States.

Mr. President, I am not going to bring an accusation against the Agricultural Department, but every man on this floor who is interested in the development of the South and in its development through the making and marketing of the cotton crop knows that upon the price obtained for this crop largely depends the welfare of every institution in those States.

It is also a notorious fact that in the two years preceding this there have been abnormally short crops. In 1910 the manufacturers, spinners, and weavers of the world met in convention in Brussels, and in that convention the American spinners, the English spinners, the India spinners, the European spinners and weavers declared that we were face to face with a cotton famine, and unless they curtailed 33⅓ per cent of the time, cotton was inevitably bound to rise to a price far beyond that now obtaining. It was further stated in their meeting in Vienna that the Agricultural Department of the United States of America was heartily cooperating with them in gathering such data as referred to the condition and supply of cotton and increasing the amount of yield to supply the spinners of the world.

Taking into account the fact that we are face to face to-day with a cotton famine, with the amount of raw material practically exhausted on account of two short years and an increase of spindles, it was peculiarly disastrous that on June 25, before a large per cent of the cotton crop of the South was up, the Agricultural Department should issue a statement that the percentage of conditions was higher than it had been in years, and that the probable outcome would be 3,000,000 bales above the year preceding. What was the result? In less than eight weeks the cotton market broke $20 on the bale, sweeping out of the South all the profits which might accrue to the grower.

We stood here and argued when reciprocity was before this body that the farmers of the West in growing wheat were not only entitled to a profit on their wheat, but the Senate attempted to pledge them the support of the Government against Canadian competition endangering that profit on wheat. In this, before the cotton crop of the South is out of the ground, the Agricultural Department issued a statement the practical effect of which was that if the mills and the weavers of the world would but wait from 60 to 90 days and run short time the markets would be flooded with an overabundance of cotton produced in the South.

Therefore, in order to counteract the influence of this report and to stay this disaster to my section, not asking for protection from the Government in reference to cotton, but asking that nothing should emanate from any of our departments under the law which shall injure them, I had a Senator from each cotton-growing State to send a telegram to the commissioners of agriculture, men elected by each one of these States to superintend the agricultural interests of those States, asking them what were the conditions obtaining as to the cotton crop and to give an estimate as to the probable yield in their States, as compared with the year previous.

Last year we made 11,423,000 bales. By the estimate of the Agricultural Department this year we will make, according to their August report, 14,700,000 bales. These are the telegrams received, which I send to the desk and ask that the Secretary may read. I wish to have them incorporated in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the telegrams, without objection.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Understand, Mr. President, before the Secretary reads, I did not send to private individuals, nor did I send a telegram myself. I got a Senator from each cotton-growing State to wire his commissioner of agriculture to give a statement as to the deterioration, if any, and what was the probable yield as compared with last year. I wish to have those telegrams read before I go further.

The Secretary read as follows:

MONTGOMERY, ALA., August 15, 1911.

Hon. J. H. BANKHEAD,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Deterioration since July 25 is at least 15 per cent. I estimate the yield, as compared with last year, 5 per cent greater.

I. F. KOLB, Commissioner.

ATLANTA, GA., August 15, 1911.

Hon. A. O. BACON, Washington, D. C.:

Deterioration of cotton since July 25 is at least 20 per cent. The yield, in comparison with last year, about the same.

T. G. HUDSON.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. When was the latest bulletin issued by the Agricultural Department relating to the condition of the cotton crop?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The condition was taken July 25 and issued August 2.

Mr. BURTON. And these telegrams seek to show——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The telegrams came in August 15.

Mr. BURTON. Showing the condition of the crop July 25.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. On July 25. I did that in justice to the Agricultural Department, to see if there was any deterioration since then so marked as to warrant the resolution which I introduced.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator yield for another question? How frequently are these bulletins issued by the Agricultural Department?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Once a month. They are gotten up on the 25th of each month and issued on the 2d of the succeeding month.

The Secretary continued the reading of the telegrams, as follows:

AUSTIN, TEX., August 15, 1911.

Hon. C. A. CULBERSON,
Washington, D. C.:

I have your wire of the 15th. There is slight deterioration in the cotton crop since July 25. The prospects are for a very slight increase, if any, in the yield in this State as compared with last year.

ED. R. KONE.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., August 15, 1911.

Senator JAMES P. CLARKE,
Washington, D. C.:

The cotton crop shows slight depreciation since July 25, caused by rain falling into the white bloom. Inferior fruitage and lateness of plant will not give us a crop exceeding last year, notwithstanding fine appearance of stalk at this time.

CLAY SLOAN,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

JACKSON, MISS., August 15, 1911.

Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
Washington, D. C.:

Deterioration 20 per cent. Excessive rains, overflow, boll weevil, and worms. Outlook not encouraging.

H. E. BLAKESLEE.

BATON ROUGE, LA., August 15, 1911.

Hon. MURPHY J. FOSTER,
Washington, D. C.:

No reports of deterioration received since date mentioned, though the continued rains now prevailing might prove disastrous. The present outlook indicates a third more cotton than last year.

E. O. BRUNER, Commissioner.

OKLAHOMA, OKLA., August 16, 1911.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Practically no change in condition of cotton since July 25. Estimated yield for this year 1,000,000 bales.

G. T. BRYAN.

SUMTER, S. C., August 14, 1911.

Hon. E. D. SMITH,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Joint meeting Sumter Farmers' Union and Chamber of Commerce. Cotton situation discussed. From information cotton yield greatly overestimated. Drought unbroken. Deterioration rapid and general. Request you urge Department of Agriculture make immediate investigation and publish results. Your actions crop reports commended.

E. W. DABBS,
President Farmers' Union.
A. W. SNELL,
Secretary Chamber of Commerce.
R. I. MANNING,
Acting Chairman.

COLUMBIA, S. C., August 15, 1911.

Senator E. D. SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Yours even date. Our crop now in the midst of crucial period. In certain sections deterioration rapid and heavy, in many others none. Condition not as good as on July 25. Until end of August would not care venture predictions as to total production. If no adverse conditions in three weeks this State's crop will be about an average crop.

E. J. WATSON, Commissioner.

RALEIGH, N. C., August 15, 1911.

Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Commissioner absent. No deterioration in cotton crop. Outlook for better yield than last year.

ELIAS CARR, Secretary.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, according to the reports from the commissioners of agriculture on the ground in these several States there are but three States indicating an increased yield, to wit, Louisiana last year made two hundred and fifty thousand and some odd hundred bales. The commissioner of agriculture of that State claims that the increase will be about one-third. In Alabama about one-fifth greater than last year, while he declares that the deterioration is going on now. In North Carolina the commissioner was not present, and his secretary said that the yield will probably be greater than last year; and North Carolina makes something over 700,000 bales. But in the States of Texas, Georgia, South Carolina, Mississippi, and Arkansas, producing nine-tenths of the cotton crop, the reports indicate very slight deteriorations since July 25 and that the probable outcome will not exceed last year.

Now, in view of these facts, I think that the Agricultural Department, which was created for the purpose of serving the interests of the farmer and not to become the master of the farmer, might investigate thoroughly and, if it will not give the process by which they arrive at these estimates, might take the occasion now upon the request of these parties interested and make the investigation. Because one of two things is true—either the commissioners of agriculture in these cotton-growing States, familiar with all the processes of cultivation, were misinformed and did not know what they were talking about, or the Agricultural Department is wrong in its deduction that there will be a record-breaking crop.

We are interested, the United States is interested, in view of the fact that last year out of $868,000,000 sold in the raw state from this country abroad, cotton alone produced $470,000,000 of that amount. Every increase in the price of raw material means that much more European money for America. Yet this report, coming on the 25th day of June, has emasculated the cotton market and depressed the price nearly 30 per cent. Therefore, the growers of this cotton are entitled to know from the Agricultural Department what are the actual conditions existing in the face of what I have had read. And now, with the permission of the Senate, I ask to have read and incorporated also the following——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEYBURN in the chair). In the absence of objection it will be read.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from South Carolina, I should like to inquire if the same climatic conditions that affect adversely the cotton crop in the South do not as a rule affect in the same way the corn crop in the South?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Almost identically, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. That being so, I want to call attention——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from North Carolina first allow the Secretary to read the paper that was ordered to be read?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In order not to break the question the Senator from North Carolina is asking, I yield before the paper is read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to call attention, in view of the statement of the Senator from South Carolina, to the very remarkable statement contained in the Government report on the condition of the cotton crop issued August 2, 1911, and the Government report on the condition of the corn crop August 9, 1911, in the States of Texas and Oklahoma. Texas and Oklahoma are both corn-growing and cotton-growing States. The Senator, as I understand, states that the same climatic conditions which injuriously affect the cotton crop affect in the same way the corn crop. In those two States this report is made: The condition of corn in Texas is reported to be 40, against 45 last month and 78 last year. That is a falling off of 38 points. The condition of cotton in Texas is reported to be 86, against 85 last month and 82 last year—that is, the condition of the cotton crop in that State is 4 points higher than it was last year. In Oklahoma the condition of corn is reported at 33, against 40 last month and 57 last year. The condition of cotton in Oklahoma is reported to be 88, against 87 last month and 87 last year; in other words, in Texas and Oklahoma, both corn and cotton growing States, the corn report shows one of the lowest records in the history of corn growing in those States, while the cotton report for the same year shows one of the highest records. Can the Senator reconcile those two reports?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should certainly dislike in the Senate of the United States to draw what conclusion I feel could be drawn from that very remarkable report. According to what the Senator has read in reference to Oklahoma and to Texas, the report shows a like condition in all the cotton-growing States; but in order not to inveigh against the Agricultural Department and to give it a clear field in which to make a clear, honest, straightforward report as to actual conditions, I call attention once again to the telegrams that I have sent to the desk and had read. I said that in Louisiana they only made 250,000 bales and that the reported increase would bring it up to less than a half a million bales. In Oklahoma they claim they will make probably a million bales. Last year they made 955,921 bales. Therefore, taking the indicated increase in Alabama, Oklahoma, and Louisiana, the cotton crop for this year can not exceed the crop of last year by more than 1,000,000 bales.

So startling was the fact that the Agricultural Department did issue a preliminary report, based on the condition of June 25, and so remarkable was the drop in the market that I myself went to the Secretary of Agriculture, interviewed him, and asked him by what authority did they issue a preliminary report when the law requires that a condition report only should be issued. His reply to me, in effect, was that it had not been issued. When I called his attention to the fact that it had been issued, he said it was without his knowledge or consent and would not be repeated. On August 2 another report was issued based upon the condition existing on July 25, which raised it practically 1 per cent higher in condition than that which existed on June 25 and stated the estimate at this time at 14,700,000 bales, but did take occasion to mark the report "unofficial."

Mr. President, the result of that was a still further depression in the cotton market, while still some of the cotton was not up in the field.

To ascertain by what process this remarkable issuance of the Agricultural Department was arrived at was the cause of my introducing the first resolution. I should like to have the Secretary now read the letter which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Sumter, S. C., August 15, 1911.

GENTLEMEN: At a joint meeting of the chamber of commerce and of the Farmers' Union of this county, held August 14, the present condition of the cotton crop was discussed. It was the consensus of opinion that the crop had greatly deteriorated since the Government report. The drought in this section is unbroken and the prospects of anything more than an average crop are not bright. Similar reports have been noted throughout the South.

In view of this situation and because of the general feeling of depression of the cotton planters as to future prices raised by the Government report, which is believed to be exaggerated, this chamber was requested to immediately correspond with the various commercial bodies in the cotton States and to invite their cooperation in allaying, so far as possible, this feeling of depression and to request their aid in securing the actual facts as to the condition of the cotton crop. The Farmers' Union of the South will cooperate in this effort.

We desire, therefore, to submit the following suggestions:

First. That each commercial body immediately telegraph its national Representatives requesting the Department of Agriculture to obtain the latest reliable information of the true condition of the cotton crop.

Second. That each body immediately ascertain the present condition of the cotton crop in its vicinity and communicate the result of this investigation to this chamber. These reports will be tabulated and published.

Third. That each body, through the local press and the direct influence of its membership, encourage the farmers to adopt the plan of a gradual marketing of their cotton, in order to avoid flooding the market by precipitately selling and thus losing a large part of their just earnings.

We are confident that concerted action at this time is of great importance to the entire South.

Very truly, yours,

SUMTER CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
By A. V. SNELL, Secretary.

Request of Mr. R. I. Manning.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the last article that I should like to have read and incorporated in my remarks is very short. After it is read I shall then introduce the resolution which I have prepared.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[An Associated Press dispatch clipped from the News and Courier, Charleston, S. C.]

THINKS CROP REPORTS COLORED—CONDITIONS EXAGGERATED, SAYS GEORGIA AGRICULTURE COMMISSIONER.

ATLANTA, August 16.

Alleging that southern crop conditions have been grossly exaggerated, T. G. Hudson, commissioner of agriculture of Georgia, has written to all similar officials in all the Southern States asking that they meet and devise plans to correct what he calls "wrong impressions of the outlook."

He asks that all farmers' organizations cooperate with the State commissioners. It is declared that crops, especially cotton, will not have as large yields as have been reported, and that such alleged false reports will tend to hurt prices.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, it is useless for me to extend this discussion further. Here are the cotton growers of the South saying that conditions—mark, now, closely—even where there is no deterioration reported, antedating June 25 or July 25, were such as to indicate that there will not be any greater yield this year than last year. Therefore it must be evident that there has been a radical mistake made somewhere. Those who are to suffer from it have a right to be heard, and I introduce the resolution I send to the desk, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution offered by him, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 140), as follows:

Resolved, That, if feasible, the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, requested to investigate immediately the condition of the cotton crop, and to make public the same at the earliest date possible.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, this seems to be an important matter, and I believe it should be fully considered. I therefore move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator, before he takes his seat, that I interviewed the Agricultural Department before introducing the resolution and asked if, in view of the request that comes from the parties affected and interested, it were not possible for them to get out an emergency report. The department said that they had been considering doing that, but they did not know whether or not it was now feasible. It will be the 2d of September before any correction can be made if the regular course is pursued. The resolution simply asks the Secretary of Agriculture—it does not command him to make the investigation, but simply, upon the request of the cotton growers, asks him, if feasible, to make this report. Every day's delay means that much loss. I do not see how the Senator can object. I am quite sure, if you can come in here and ask that laws be passed artificially to protect the interests of the agriculturists of the West, we can make a simple request like this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to inquire of the Senator from South Carolina whether or not the resolution which he now sends to the desk is in lieu of the resolution he has heretofore presented?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; it is an independent resolution. It has no reference whatever to the other resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution he has presented.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to have the resolution again read, so that the chairman of the Agricultural Committee may fully understand it.

Mr. BURNHAM. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to state that, in case that is done, it may be impossible to secure the relief sought and afford the Agricultural Department the opportunity to investigate fairly and to make report, so that the feeling which has caused the protests against this alleged report shall be allayed. The department have their correspondents, and a wire this afternoon would reach them all.

I was informed by the Agricultural Department that they were considering the advisability of getting out an intermonthly report under unusual conditions. They interposed no objection to a resolution of the kind I have presented; and I do not think it fair to the cotton growers, to the Agricultural Department, and to the vast interests affected by this great fiber that any delay should be made; in view of the fact that the gamblers have taken advantage of this report from the Agricultural Department to practically emasculate and ruin the price of cotton, and reduce the people of the South to almost a condition of panic. I think it nothing but fair that as mild a resolution as that which I have offered should be passed. I do not want to be forced to go into some things that I might feel disposed to say.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina is a member of the Committee on Agriculture, and it seems to me that something more than an answer to these inquiries should be gone into by the committee. The method of collecting this information should be considered, and there should be a further and fuller investigation of the whole question.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The resolution leaves it optional with the Secretary of Agriculture whether or not he will accede. It provides that, if feasible, he shall immediately ascertain the condition of the cotton crop at the present time. I hope the Senator will withdraw his motion.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that, of course, an objection will carry the resolution over.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I understand that.

Mr. WARREN. And if the Senator, being a member of the Committee on Agriculture, will let the matter go to the committee to-day, I think he will make time, rather than to have it objected to and have it hung up.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will indicate that he will call the committee together to-day to consider the resolution, I certainly will let it take that course.

Mr. BURNHAM. In reply to the Senator from South Carolina, I will say that I will call a meeting of the committee at once.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is satisfactory to me, if we can have an immediate report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

RAILROADS AND COAL DEPOSITS IN ALASKA—A BILL FOR OPENING THE COAL MINES, ESTABLISHING MARINE AND RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION, AND DEVELOPING A PUBLIC HARBOR AT CONTROLLER BAY, IN ALASKA.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I inquire if morning business is closed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is not closed. Concurrent and other resolutions are in order. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, morning business is closed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan and Mr. POINDEXTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I move to take up Calendar No. 122, being Senate joint resolution 57.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, I think there has been no opportunity for introducing bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order of business has been passed, but by unanimous consent bills may be introduced.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understood that the introduction of bills came after the call of petitions and memorials. I have been here constantly——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order of business comes after the reports of committees. That order has been passed, but, in the absence of objection, the bill will be received.

Mr. POINDEXTER. And reports of committees likewise come after petitions and memorials. Out of order I ask unanimous consent to introduce the bill which I send to the desk.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Will that interefere with the motion I have made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at all.

The bill (S. 3262) extending the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission over railroads in Alaska, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I desire to say briefly in reference to the bill which has just been introduced that it deals with the question stated in the title, which is a very important one, of extending the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission to railroads in Alaska, which are now without such regulation, the importance of which I will not discuss, because it is obvious.

Another matter which is dealt with in this bill is one of extremely pressing importance to all the people of the Pacific coast, and particularly to the States of Washington and Oregon; that is, the need for the development and use of deposits of coal in Alaska. This bill provides for the immediate opening up at the most available point of the coal in Alaska in the Bering River coal fields by the Government, particularly for the use of the United States Navy on the Pacific coast, for the Revenue-Cutter Service, for the coaling stations on the Pacific coast, and for other Government needs on the Pacific coast; and also that it shall be supplied, when it is opened up with the facilities provided for in this bill, for commercial purposes to private persons at the cost of mining, with a reasonable profit, stated in the bill. That for the purpose of accomplishing this the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, shall construct a railroad from Controller Bay to these coal fields. The feasibility of such a road has been demonstrated by surveys that have already been made. Of course, additional surveys by the Government will be required.

It also provides for the procuring and operating of a sufficient number of ships of sufficient tonnage from Controller Bay to ports on Puget Sound.

It also provides that the title of the public coal lands in the Bering River coal fields shall be reserved by the Government, and that the title to the harbor of Controller Bay, the shore lines, tidelands, shore lands, and franchises and easements in the harbor and upon the shores shall be retained by the Government, and that a harbor shall be developed there by the Government. That it shall be open to the public on such terms and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of War.

I will not detain the Senate at this time, although I will at some future time ask permission to state in more detail and at greater length the conditions which, in my judgment, require this legislation. One of those conditions, in addition to what I have already mentioned, being what has been demonstrated, I think, by the proceedings and the course of events with reference to Alaska, that this is the only recourse of the people of the United States to avoid the control of coal and transportation in Alaska by a monopoly.

The effort to establish a monopoly there has been disclosed by sworn testimony in a number of proceedings, both seeking to establish a monopoly by the acquirement of title to land, and where that fails by the acquirement of exclusive privileges to control the only harbor which furnishes access to these natural resources, the use of which at a reasonable price is absolutely essential not only to the people of Washington, but in a lesser degree, perhaps, to the people of the entire country.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. For what purpose?

Mr. NELSON. I should like to be heard for a moment on the bill which has just been introduced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington was proceeding by unanimous consent on the reference of the bill; so that it is not before the Senate in any sense.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I hope there will be no objection to hearing the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I do not ask for any hearing. It is simply relating to the question of the reference of the bill to a committee. I do not want to say anything on the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am firmly of the impression——

Mr. NELSON. What I desire to say was simply this: The bill appears to relate mainly to public lands in Alaska, and it seems to me it ought to go either to the Committee on Public Lands or to the Committee on Territories, and that it does not belong to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. It relates to harbor lands and coal lands; in other words, the public lands of Alaska, and therefore it ought to go either to the Committee on Public Lands or to the Committee on Territories; certainly not to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan further yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I only——

Mr. NELSON. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I object for the reason and make the point of order that it has already been referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. NELSON. I tried to be heard when that reference——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it is not too late for a Senator to make a motion for reference if he desires.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly; I do not object to a motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not object to the Senator from Minnesota making a motion to that effect. But I desire to say in this connection that while perhaps it would be proper in the case of this bill, as it is in a great many other bills, to refer it to either one of a number of committees, the principal object of this bill, the principal subject with which it deals, is transportation in Alaska.

It provides for the construction of a railroad and the operation of a railroad, the establishment of a line of vessels, and the operation of a line of vessels, and for the conferring of jurisdiction upon the Interstate Commerce Commission over the railroads of Alaska. It also is true, as said by the Senator from Minnesota, that it provides for reserving from sale certain public lands of Alaska. The principal question it deals with is transportation, which properly, unquestionably, is peculiarly within the province of the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It seems to the Chair, from a casual reading of the bill, a hurried glance over the bill, that it properly belongs to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan further yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say that a similar bill has been before the Committee on Public Lands, perhaps not the same in wording, and all bills affecting public lands in Territories have always been referred to the Committee on Public Lands. It seems to me this bill ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection has been made to such reference.

Mr. NELSON. I made a motion that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to say in that connection that I have no objection to the suggestion of the Chair, which I think is eminently pertinent, that the bill should be referred to the Committee on Territories. I think that that committee obviously is constituted for dealing with such purposes as this bill provides for.

I do object to its being referred to the Committee on Public Lands, because the public-lands feature of the bill is merely incidental to the purpose of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Minnesota that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" appear to have it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no such thing as a division after the yeas and nays are refused. The Senator asked for the yeas and nays, which were refused. The ayes have it, and the bill is referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 57) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of Arizona to form a constitution and a State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. BAILEY. Is this matter before the Senate for consideration?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is that the Senate now proceed to its consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. Is it a request for unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a motion. Morning business is closed, and the motion is in order.

Mr. BAILEY. That motion is not debatable, I believe.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it is not, nor amendable. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Michigan that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to ask when the joint resolution was reported to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was reported yesterday.

Mr. BAILEY. Is the joint resolution on the calendar?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The joint resolution was reported yesterday from the Committee on Territories and is on the calendar.

I will say to the Senator from Texas that it is identical in form with the joint resolution presented by the House committee to-day.

Mr. BAILEY. That does not help it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That was for the information of the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. If both Houses have made a mistake, it does not relieve either House——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I object to debate on the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan himself is indulging in it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I object.

Mr. BAILEY. I am rising to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so assumed, although the Senator has not so stated.

Mr. BAILEY. I had not reached that point. The fact was I was trying to examine the calendar, and I was going to raise the question whether or not it is in order to make the motion to proceed with this joint resolution until we reach it on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is in order. The joint resolution was reported on a previous day and is on the calendar, and the motion is in order.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I submit the question of order, that it is not in order to pass over matters on the calendar and give precedence by a motion of this kind to matters at the foot of the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? [Putting the question.] The "ayes" appear to have it. The "ayes" have it.

Mr. BAILEY. I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas raises the point of no quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Foster	Martine, N. J.	Shively
Borah	Gamble	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Guggenheim	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Heyburn	Nixon	Smoot
Burnham	Hitchcock	Oliver	Swanson
Burton	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Taylor
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Owen	Thornton
Clapp	Jones	Page	Townsend
Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Paynter	Warren
Crawford	Lea	Percy	Watson
Cullom	Lippitt	Perkins	Wetmore
Cummins	Lorimer	Poindexter	Williams
Curtis	McLean	Pomerene	Works
Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Root

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to state for the day that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is unavoidably detained from the city.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I want to announce that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE] is not only detained for the day on account of illness, but has been for several days past.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce for the day that my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is out of the city and is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER].

Mr. NELSON. I desire to say that the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is detained from the Chamber by illness, and that he has a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Michigan that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the joint resolution should be read.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan what has become of the President's veto message?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator will have to ask his own colleagues in the House. I do not know anything about it officially.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought the Senator had been in consultation——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The statehood resolution originated in the House and the veto message went there first under the rule.

Mr. BAILEY. I perfectly understand.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand it is in the hands of the Committee on the Territories of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BAILEY. I perfectly understand that; but the Senator was so swift to say that the joint resolution is identical with the House resolution I suspected he had been in consultation with them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was not only quick to say it, but glad to say it. I think it rather significant——

Mr. BAILEY. I am rather delighted myself to see the Senator from Michigan accepting the judgment of a Democratic House of Representatives.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. I think it denotes a degree of progress I had not hoped for in his case.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am not at all surprised to see the Senator from Texas rejecting the advice of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BAILEY. I not only reject it, but I intend before the debate is over to expose the lack of wisdom in it; and in doing that I regret to say I will be impelled to include the Senator from Michigan in the list of unwise statesmen.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I shall be very happy to be embraced in that very numerous company of men whom the Senator from Texas frequently disagrees with.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I have differed with nearly everybody, and everybody has been wrong when I differed with them, too.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It may turn that way now.

Mr. BAILEY. They frequently tell me they were wrong when they did differ with me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the joint resolution ought to be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to amend the joint resolution. I send the following committee amendment to the desk to be inserted after the word "of," in line 5, page 1.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 5, after the word "of," insert:

An act entitled "An act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, commonly called."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I simply desire to say that it was intended that that amendment should go in after the word "of," and in printing the joint resolution it got transposed with the title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In section 4, page 7, line 5, I move to strike out the letter "s," so as to read "ballot" instead of "ballots."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. Are there other amendments?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There are no other amendments.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There was one other amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon calls the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the fact that there is another committee amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is the amendment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In printing the title is not as it ought to appear.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The title will be amended after the bill is passed. I will keep in mind the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask a question of the Senator in charge of the joint resolution. I understand the joint resolution now before the Senate, so far as the question of Arizona is concerned, attempts to work a change of article 8, section 1, of their constitution with reference to the recall of the judiciary?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It does.

Mr. BORAH. The change which it is sought to effect is accomplished by requiring them to change their constitution before they can become a State?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is the intention of this provision, and in the present parliamentary situation it seems necessary.

Mr. BORAH. The effect of the joint resolution, then, as distinguished from the joint resolution which was passed the other day, is that they shall at least eliminate the recall during the time they are coming into the Union.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That they shall eliminate the recall, so far as it applies to the judiciary, before the proclamation of the President can be made. That has been done by changing the House joint resolution, at the top of page 10, by adding, in line 1, after the words "vote upon," the words "and ratify, and adopt," before the words "the following proposed amendment," and by another amendment further on, near the end of the bill, to which I will call the attention of Senators.

Mr. BORAH. The joint resolution which we passed the other day provided that the electors of Arizona should vote again upon the question of the recall as a separate proposition. Now, the only difference between that joint resolution and this joint resolution is that by the latter you require them to positively take it out of their constitution during the time that they are being admitted into the Union.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We require them to take it out of the constitution.

Mr. BORAH. But there is no way to prevent them from putting it in immediately after they are admitted into the Union.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will be perfectly frank with the Senator. We are quite in accord as to the right of the new State to amend and change its constitution in such manner as the people may desire after they become a State, just as the right exists in all other States.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator think that there is any considerable progress made toward settling finally the question of the recall of the judiciary by eliminating it from the constitution of Arizona for the period of six months?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think it will prove very helpful in getting the State into the Union, which I very much desire. Beyond that we are powerless to enjoin the new State, and have made no attempt to do so.

Mr. BORAH. I was trying to work out in my own mind what we were accomplishing by this change. It has always seemed to me that if we wanted to make permanent progress with reference to eliminating the recall it would have to be finally submitted in argument and in reason to the voters of that State and that we gain nothing by throwing into the balance the great desire to be admitted into the Union, because undoubtedly the effect of this will be that they will eliminate it and come into the Union, and when they are rid of the supervisory power of the Congress will reinsert it when they desire to do so; and they will do so under the resentment of having been compelled to come into the Union in this way.

Mr. President, I am just as much opposed to the recall as the committee or as anyone else, but I have thought, and I still think, that the only way to make permanent progress in this matter is to submit it in fairness and in candor to the people of the State of Arizona as a separate proposition. If a majority of them are not in favor of this proposition that will settle it and settle it permanently. The effect of settling it in that way would be much more to the advantage of those who are opposed to it than to settle it temporarily by throwing into the balance the price of statehood.

While I suppose that the committee, in view of the situation, has worked out the proposition the best way possible, I want to go on record as saying that in my judgment this ought to have been submitted as it was proposed to be submitted. It is my opinion that if the people of Arizona had been given an opportunity to vote upon it singly and alone they would have rejected the proposition, but if they would not have done so, then the work we are doing now is wholly in vain, because we will not be able to control them after they come into the Union. It may satisfy some personal pride about the matter, but I do not believe that it will in the end serve any good purpose in finally settling the question of the recall of the judiciary.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if it is competent for a State to provide for the recall of judges, then it is not now and it never was the province of the Congress of the United States to deny it admission into the Union because it has included such a provision in its constitution. Of course, we have the power for any reason, good or bad, or for no reason at all, to turn these Territories from our doors; but, sir, it is a gross abuse of our power to do so if they have sufficient population and have tendered us a constitution republican in form and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

But, Mr. President, this resolution is not only objectionable in so far as it seeks to compel Arizona to reject the recall which her people have adopted. It is also objectionable because it attempts to coerce New Mexico into changing her constitution with respect to the amendment clause of it. New Mexico adopted a constitution which renders an amendment of it well nigh impossible. The pending resolution—and I would not criticize the committee harshly, since my amiable friend, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], is the chairman of it and responsible for this measure—completely reverses the process of New Mexico, and prescribes a form which makes the constitution of that State almost as easily amendable as a statute. In other words, the people of New Mexico, when speaking for themselves, made it extremely difficult to amend their organic law, while the Congress of the United States, speaking for the people of New Mexico, have solemnly provided that a mere majority of the legislature can submit an amendment, and a mere majority of the people may adopt it. Neither extreme is a wise one. A constitution ought not to be like "the law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not," nor should it be like a statute, subject to the will of a bare majority. Between these two extremes lies the path of safety. If the committee were not satisfied with the provision of New Mexico on this subject they ought not to have fallen into the other extreme, but they ought to have provided that an amendment to the constitution of that new State could only be submitted by a vote of two-thirds of the legislature.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If my friend from Texas will permit me, I desire to call his attention to article 19 of the constitution of New Mexico, which provides—

SECTION 1. Any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed in either house of the legislature at any regular session thereof, and if two-thirds of all members elected to each of the two houses, voting separately, shall vote in favor thereof, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered on their respective journals with the yeas and nays thereon; or any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed at the first regular session of the legislature held after the expiration of two years from the time this constitution goes into effect, or at the regular session of the legislature convening each eighth year thereafter, and if a majority of all the members elected to each of the two houses voting separately at said sessions shall vote in favor thereof——

The amendment shall be submitted. I have simply read this for the purpose of calling the attention of my friend from Texas to the fact that we have only anticipated that which may be done two years after they are admitted into the Union, namely, that a majority of the legislature may propose amendments if they so desire.

Mr. BAILEY. Why did you change it, then?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We changed it to meet an emergency.

Mr. BAILEY. Why did you not let the people of New Mexico meet their own emergency?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have no hesitation in saying that we changed it to meet an emergency, and the change, in my opinion, is not such as will be disappointing. It is not radical, and makes the first clause in the constitution with reference to amendment harmonize entirely with what they themselves have declared they shall have a right to do after two years.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Michigan does not seem to thoroughly apprehend the provision which he has read. It does not provide that a majority may submit an amendment every two years, but it expressly confines the power of the mere majority to the first regular session held after the expiration of the first two years under the constitution, and thereafter to a regular session each eighth year. Not only so, but an amendment proposed by a majority of the legislature under that restriction is made still further and even more difficult by special regulations as to the popular vote. This amendment recommended by the committee, however, completely removes the restrictions on the legislative power of proposing, and destroys the limitations on the popular vote by which the people of New Mexico may adopt an amendment.

The Senator from Michigan will permit me, with all due respect, to say that, while we are acting here under a constitution which requires two-thirds of each House to propose an amendment and three-fourths of all the States to ratify it before it can become a part of our Constitution, it is a curious course of political reasoning that leads us to adopt this easy method of amending the organic law of a newly admitted State.

I am not, Mr. President, a disciple of that school of American thought which believes that it is the sum of all wisdom to make legislation easy. I am willing for the deliberate and well-matured judgment of the people to be written into the law of the land; and I am willing for the well-matured and deliberate judgment of the people to be incorporated into the organic law of this Republic or of any State; but I want to be certain before we either amend the Constitution or enact a law that we are executing the deliberate and matured judgment of the people. I think no greater mistake can be made than the modern tendency to substitute the law-making method for the constitution-making method.

But, Mr. President, I fear that we are approaching a time when the constitutions of our States and the Constitution of the United States are to be superseded by the initiative and the referendum. If we have it, sir, in the States, we will ultimately have it in the Nation. Let no man deceive himself into thinking that a system of legislation can be applied to these States without, in time, being applied to this Nation. When you do apply it to the Nation, the wonderful system established by our fathers—this Government, which in the first and greatest commentary ever written upon it, was described as a wholly novel system of government—must perish. Under the initiative the laws of the United States will be made by a majority of the people, and the equality of the States, as represented in this Chamber, will become a relic of the ages which have passed and gone. When the laws of Congress must be referred to the people, that referendum shall be decided according to the vote of all the people, and the equality of the States in the Senate, which we are wont to describe as the greatest legislative assembly in the world, can not survive.

Mr. President, when I say that I fear the ultimate establishment of the initiative and referendum I must not be understood as thinking that they will triumph by reason of the arguments in their favor. The danger of their acceptance, sir, arises out of the fact that the men who advocate them are striving constantly to promote their cause, while the men who are opposed to them seem afraid to declare their opposition. This halting fear has been manifest throughout this debate. Read this RECORD, sir. There is not an advocate of the initiative and referendum in this body who has not pronounced in favor of it during the course of this discussion, and I honor them for their courage as much as I think they are mistaken in their principles. On the other hand, except myself alone, no Democratic opponent of the initiative and referendum has dared to assail it. It will not do to say that it is not an issue. It is as much an issue as the recall of judges, but you have sought to evade it because you are afraid of it. You are skulking and hiding from it, but you may just as well come out into the open and face it. These men intend to press it until you must meet it. If you think it a wise and just system of legislation you ought to say so; and if it is not you ought to have the courage to oppose it. Will you vote for this joint resolution which denounces that provision of the New Mexico constitution with respect to its amendment and which denounces the provision of the Arizona constitution with respect to its recall of the judiciary, without saying one word against the initiative and referendum?

Mr. President, there are, in my opinion, 20 Members of this Senate to-day who openly, courageously, and intelligently—if intelligence can ever be properly employed in such a propaganda—advocate this doctrine, and the remainder of us sit here as silent as the grave. I can take that band of aggressive, courageous, intelligent advocates of the initiative and referendum, and I can finally adopt it against an overwhelming majority that fears to say a word in opposition to it. The men who advocate a measure will always finally defeat the men who temporize with it; and this is as it ought to be, because if men will not stand up and oppose it, they must have a doubt, at least, about whether it is wise or not, or else they must be arrant cowards. The people will finally accept any proposition that nobody opposes and many men advocate. That is exactly what will happen in this case unless men can summon courage enough to discuss the initiative and referendum. Let us discuss it, and, if it is right, it will prevail; but unless we do discuss it, it will prevail, whether it is right or wrong.

This is the first time in the history of this Republic that the initiative and referendum system of legislation has been presented for the consideration of Congress, and shall this distinct departure from the fundamental principles of a representative government pass unchallenged? So far as I know, I am the only man on this side of the Chamber who has declared his opposition to them, and only two or three on the other side have done so. That is another instance where the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] will find that I differ with many of my associates.

The Senator from Michigan is opposed to the recall. He is opposed to the initiative; he is opposed to the referendum; but he leaves me to say so for him. He has not put that declaration in the RECORD for himself.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; and as usual—no; not as usual, but as is frequently the case—the Senator from Texas has put it in wrong.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand how impossible it would be for an old-fashioned Democrat to speak with authority about the opinions of a new-fashioned Republican, but in order that I may have the benefit of it, because I might desire to submit some observations on it, I should like for the Senator from Michigan to inform me wherein I am wrong.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Wrong in attempting to quote my attitude on the initiative and referendum, and recall.

Mr. BAILEY. I know, but in what particular? Is the Senator in favor of the referendum and opposed to the initiative? Or is he in favor of the initiative and referendum and opposed to the recall? Or is he in favor of the initiative, referendum, and recall of all officers except judges?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Texas, seemingly a little shy of arguments in his own cause, has drafted me as a living example of what he desires to prove, and I will enlighten him. The initiative and referendum, so far as it concerns the people of the State in which I live and where I exercise the right of suffrage, is a matter of their concern, If the proposition were submitted to a vote, and I as a private citizen or as a public man, voting in my private capacity as a citizen, were called to vote upon the question of the adoption of the initiative and referendum, I would distinguish between what was radical and what was conservative. If a conservative initiative and referendum were proposed I might consent to it; if a radical one were proposed I might oppose it. From my present point of view I would oppose both.

Mr. BAILEY. That is the most explicit declaration. It reminds me of a story which I have heard of a Tennessee campaign, when "Jimmie" Jones, as he was familiarly and affectionately called, was a candidate against James K. Polk. Jones was a remarkable man, without much education or information, while Polk was a man with a good deal of education and still more information. Polk knew something about every public question and knew all about some of them, while Jones did not know all about any public question and knew nothing about some of them, but he was a wonderful man on the stump before the people. One of the questions about which Polk knew everything and Jones knew nothing was the tariff, and Polk continually challenged Jones for a debate on it.

Finally Jones announced that if nothing would do Mr. Polk except a discussion of the tariff question, he would state his position and then let Mr. Polk discuss it; and he said that his position was this: If the tariff was too high, he was in favor of lowering it, and if it was too low, he was in favor of "highering" it. [Laughter.] To my mind that is about as definite as the position of the Senator from Michigan on the initiative and referendum and recall as he has stated it for himself. If it is wrong, he is opposed to it, and if it is right, he is in favor of it. [Laughter.]

Whenever I reach the point where I hesitate to stand up and combat the initiative and referendum, I will be ready to embrace it. If I can not successfully assail it, it must be because I am either deficient in intellect or it is right in principle, and all of us may as well make up our minds now to take one side or the other of that question. It transcends in its importance even the great economic question which we have debated for the past two months, because it goes to the very foundation of this Republic. If this can not be made a government of the people and for the people and by the people except through the initiative and referendum, then as surely as God lives and rules this universe the adoption of that system is certain to come. On the other hand, if it be true, as I believe it is, that a representatime democracy, a democracy in which the representatives of the people chosen by them, and responsible, as Jefferson said, to them at short intervals, is the best system of government, then it is our duty to vindicate it before the world. Surely, sir, whatever may be our view, with this question pressing itself upon the public attention, we ought to stand out in the open and argue it, and let the people choose between us and our adversaries.

There are to-day three organizations promoting the adoption of the initiative and referendum. Two of those organizations have for their conspicuous leaders, Senators, one on the one side and another on the other side of this Chamber. The third organization has a man who is skilled, I understand, in these matters of publicity. With men of character, intellect, and unswerving courage advocating them, do you expect to defeat them by sitting idly by, allowing those men to advocate them while you utter never a word in opposition to them?

Mr. President, I shall not occupy the time of the Senate now in discussing the initiative and referendum; but I want to say to my Democratic associates that in every State in this Union to-day there is a systematic and an aggressive campaign to incorporate a declaration in favor of them in the Democratic platform next year. What are you going to do? Are you going to oppose it, or are you going to tell the people that you have not made up your minds about it? There is not a Democrat on this floor from a Southern State who has not denounced the initiative and referendum as a supreme folly. We did that 20 years ago when the old Populist Party was advocating it. Every Democrat from the South from every stump that he could find surrounded by an audience to hear him, ridiculed and denounced it. Where are your clarion voices now? I do not hear them. I denounced the initiative and referendum then, not because it was proposed by the Populist Party, but because I believed then, and I denounce it now because I believe, that it is a departure from the settled and fundamental principles of a republican form of government. But a future occasion for that.

I come to the point at issue—the recall of judges. We passed a bill allowing Arizona to vote on that question. I do not know officially what has become of it. Why shall we pass another bill substantially the same as that? We have no information officially that it has not been approved, and certainly we have none that it has been disapproved. Do our friends on the other side seek to save the President from a test of strength? I do not mean on the other side of the Chamber; I mean on the other side as to party, because I realize that it has not reached here yet, and I realize furthermore that I must not criticize the other House of Congress because they have not acted on it. It was for them, if they did not choose to take issue with the President, to introduce and pass a resolution and send it here, rather than for us to anticipate their action; but whether the President was right or wrong we ought to have fought it out with him. I will vote to sustain him, while the Senator from Michigan would be compelled to vote to overrule his veto. Would the Senator from Michigan so vote?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I am not in the habit of responding to a categorical cross-examination from the other side of the Chamber upon any subject, but I do not hesitate to say to the Senator from Texas that I should have voted to sustain him.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the President's veto message has changed the Senator's mind.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I voted for the Nelson amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator voted for the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I voted for the Nelson amendment because I thought it would facilitate the prompt admission of these Territories, and I would have voted to sustain the President, because I think the same course would have facilitated their admission.

Mr. BAILEY. Did the Senator from Michigan vote for the bill on its final passage?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did, and reported it from the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, if the Senator voted to pass it in the first instance, why would he vote against passing it in the second instance? The same vote by which the resolution was sent to the President will make it the law, notwithstanding his disapproval.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I realize, as does the Senator from Texas, that we are in the last days of this legislative session.

Mr. BAILEY. We have not yet adopted a resolution to adjourn.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; but the Senator from Texas knows very well that we are about to dissolve.

Mr. BAILEY. Not until we have done our full duty, I hope.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want this Congress to adjourn without redeeming a promise which your party made in its last national platform and which our party made, to welcome the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico into the Union of States. I do not propose that that promise shall be broken if I can prevent it, and I hope sincerely that the eminent ability and the splendid character of the Senator from Texas, of which I have long been an admirer, will not now be interposed for the purpose of preventing the execution of a solemn promise made by his party in the last national convention.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator may be sure I intend no filibuster. I was cured of that habit last year. I am going to finish what I have to say about it and permit a vote upon it. Unwise as I think the majority often are, I submit always to their decision; and unwise, as I am sure they are in this instance, I shall submit, not with good grace, because I have lost that art in these latter days; but still I will submit with such grace as I can command.

But, Mr. President, I come back to the proposition that the Senator, who voted to pass that bill as the President vetoed it, must now change his vote if he sustains the President's veto; and I think no Senator ought ever to change his vote unless he has changed his mind. I would not hesitate a moment to change my vote if I had changed my mind. I think every honest man ought to do that, and I had almost said that every honest man must do it. Consistency, sir, is the virtue of fools, and no man ought to be a slave to it. I am frank to say that I love to be consistent, because every time I find that I have been inconsistent I am compelled to acknowledge to myself, and I do not hesitate to acknowledge it to others, that I have been wrong one time or the other. If I am consistent, I may have been wrong both times, but I have at least had a chance to be right both times. Whenever I am inconsistent, I must have been wrong one time or the other. I commend that suggestion to the Senator from Michigan, for whom I have quite as much respect as he has for me. Indeed, I have so much respect for him, Mr. President, that, if I were tempted to resort to an undue delay of this bill, he could dissuade me from it.

Now, Mr. President, let us be candid with each other. The effort—and I say it with all due respect to the President, who has written a very excellent message attempting to distinguish between the recall as applied to judges and as applied to other officers of the Government; I say it with deference not only because I respect his great office, but I say it because I respect the man who at present occupies it—to distinguish between the recall as applied to judicial officers and as applied to legislative and executive officers has proceeded upon a mere sentiment, sir, and has not been rested upon any substantial principle.

There is a distinction, and a vital distinction, between recalling judges and recalling legislators; but I have not heard it advanced in this debate. That distinction was not suggested in the veto message which I have unofficially read, nor have I heard it even intimated on the floor of the Senate. Why was this? Was it because it would raise the question of the initiative and referendum? That difference is this, Mr. President: If, under the initiative, the people should pass a law and a court should hold that law unconstitutional, the people would promptly recall that court. With the initiative and referendum system of legislation, supplemented by the recall of the judiciary, you might as well make a bonfire of your Constitution, for it would not even be the thing of shreds and patches, which a Greek philosopher once said all written constitutions were destined to become. Outside of that one distinction, the recall as applied to judges is not more serious than the recall as applied to the legislative and the executive officers of the Government.

Why do you object to the recall of judges? Because they say, sir, that the judge will bend the supple hinges of the knee in the presence of political agitators. Let us grant that; but if, sir, the recall will make a coward of the judge, it will make a coward of the sheriff and in the face of his sworn duty to protect the lives of those under his jurisdiction, he will hand over to the infuriated mob the victim of its prejudice. If the recall will make a coward of the judge, will it not make a coward of the prosecuting attorney? And I would rather have an ignorant or a servile judge, who must occupy a seat in the presence of all the people, than to have a district attorney of his kind, because that district attorney goes into the secrecy of the grand-jury room, and there, moved by passion and prejudice, servility or cowardice, he can blast the reputation of the best man or the purest woman in his community. Oh, no, Mr. President, if the recall will make cowards of judges it will make cowards out of all the men to whom it can be applied, and we trifle, sir, with the greater question when we except the judiciary and still leave it applicable to all other officers.

I want to go further, Mr. President, and say—and when I have done that I shall have said all I intend to say this afternoon upon this subject—as surely as cause produces effect, or as surely as effect follows cause, if you adopt the recall and apply it to all your other officers, you will finally apply it to your judges. When I talk with Senators—no, I will not say when I talk with Senators—I will say when I go outside of the Chamber and talk with the average citizen, he says he is opposed to the recall as applied to everybody, but that the public mind can be more easily arrested and concentrated on the judiciary. That is not the way to deal with the public, sir. If this is right, the public is entitled to have it; and if it is wrong, the public is entitled to have your reasons for thinking it is wrong. If it is right, my confidence in the ultimate wisdom and patriotism of the people is such as to believe that it will be finally adopted; if it is wrong, I have every confidence that it will be finally rejected if only our public men have the courage and the wisdom to properly discuss it.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I shall not take any time to-day in discussing the initiative, referendum, and recall. I do not consider that they are directly involved in the pending joint resolution. But I desire to say this: I have listened to the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], as I always do, with pleasure. I am not much given to paying compliments, but I admire him for his wonderful ability and for his fearlessness. He was absolutely right when he declared that, rising above the mere question whether calico cloth shall have a tariff of 3 cents or 3½ cents, towers the question that is involved in this joint resolution. The Senator is right. If we are wrong in our contention for the more direct participation of the people in government, then the progress of our movement is not to the best interest of this Republic. On the other hand, if we are right, then to delay it is to oppose that progress which bears upon its bosom the welfare of this Republic.

It has been my privilege during the last few months to discuss this question in many of the various States, and I would be glad, advocating as I do this movement, if more men like the Senator from Texas would come out and take their position and make such arguments as they can in opposition to our movement. The movement is progressing largely upon the assumption upon our part that we are right, and without any reasons being given in opposition to our views. If we are right, we will win; and if the Senator from Texas is right, it would be better if more men like him would come out and, like him, boldly and candidly give their side of this question—men like him who believe that the initiative lies at the foundation, and that once you have the initiative there is no stop this side of the recall, for as sure as water flows downhill that is the law of this movement. While we believe we are right, it is far better that both sides of the question be discussed.

We do say, on this floor, believing that we are right, that we are dealing with fundamentals, that nothing can stop this movement half way. Eighteen Senators and a President, backed by the lure of patronage, may delay it; they may divert it. We claim that in the last analysis our movement means that in every department and at every point the American people shall control and govern this Republic.

Mr. President, a word in regard to the joint resolution which is pending before this body. I can not understand the necessity for this joint resolution at this point, because when the former joint resolution was before this body there were 58 votes for it and only 18 votes against it. It is urged by the Senator from Michigan that he desires to expedite the admission of Arizona and New Mexico. If there are men in this Chamber who sincerely want to expedite the admission of Arizona and New Mexico, all they have to do is to stand by their convictions as expressed upon that former vote. We have already passed a resolution for their admission. The President has vetoed that resolution. All that is necessary to expedite their admission is to refuse to sustain that veto. I can not, save as now and then a Senator may stand here and admit it for himself, charge that Senators who, after the long debate upon this question, voted for the joint resolution upon the former occasion will now change their votes when no additional reason has been given for making that change.

I therefore, Mr. President, view with some little suspicion the claim that this is done to expedite the admission of Arizona. It is in the power of the Senate to-day, the moment the joint resolution passes the House, if it should pass the House over the President's veto, to expedite the admission of Arizona by voting to override the President's veto. So there is nothing to my mind in that claim.

Now, look at the position in which the Senate is placed. We have already said to the people of Arizona—or some of us, for I must be somewhat particular in that respect, believing, as I do, in the recall—we have said to the people of Arizona, "You take one more vote on this question, but you vote with the independence and the freedom of American free men; and if you vote for the recall you can come into this Union, or if you vote against it you can come into this Union"; leaving it entirely to the voters of Arizona. That is the resolution the President has vetoed. Without waiting to see whether the veto can be sustained, it is now proposed to force them to reject the recall as the price of admission. That is the provision of the pending resolution. Now let us see where the electorate of Arizona is placed by this pending joint resolution. We have the solemn verdict of an overwhelming majority, almost four to one, of the electorate of Arizona that they believe in the recall of judges.

But we say to the people of Arizona, "You can only come into the American Union upon one price, and that is that you surrender your judgment, that you play the rôle of the hypocrite and vote temporarily against the recall, and then when you are admitted to this Union, you can go back again and vote for the recall."

Mr. President, last winter, I think it was, this country was astonished by the tale of debauchery that came, I think, from the State of Ohio in a certain locality in that State and other localities in this country which betrayed a want of fidelity and of integrity on the part of the American voter, and yet the Senate proposes to initiate a new electorate into the art of self-government by telling them, "You can come in here only at the sacrifice of your convictions temporarily." In other words, you who exercise a right that has caused this old earth to reel under the tread of armies that you might vote as an American citizen, have to vote once without the exercise of your own judgment and your own conviction. Ah, that is a fine lesson to put before the electorate of this country—a plain effort and a plain purpose and the plain effect of debauching the electorate of a proposed State as the price of admission to this Union.

Mr. President, for almost two years I have been in constant touch and harmony with the people of Arizona. I pity those people. I know what they had to face down there in their effort to pass that constitution against the power of the administration. I know something of the combination of power of political and commercial plunderers that invaded that Territory to override the will of that people. I know something of the sacrifice they have made down there; and if I could, without violating my oath as an American Senator, I would say, "Come in on any terms that will admit you." But as a Senator, under my oath, I can not say that. I do not mean that the American Constitution is a moral code, but I do mean that the American Constitution was framed for a people who recognize a broad moral law, and I can not, even at the risk of offending those with whom I have worked during these two years, be a party to the putting up to a people the proposition that the price of admission to the Union is the integrity of citizenship, that they must vote against their convictions in order to gain admission.

But, Mr. President, that is not all, nor is it the end. We talk about party pledges. We pledged the people of Arizona and we pledged the people of New Mexico statehood; but did that pledge involve as the price of their admission that they must sacrifice their honor, that they must submit to debauchery at the hand of the allied force, political and commercial, which is seeking to dominate this country?

Talk about party pledges! It is another of those broken pledges that will yet rise to confront our party. It is not the fulfillment of a pledge. The pledge was that those men would be treated like citizens of this Republic, and admitted as free men into the ranks of American citizenship; and to force them to vote against their convictions as the price of admission is no more the fulfillment of our party pledge than was the passage of the tariff bill two years ago the performance of a party pledge upon that question. The loss of control of the House and the narrow margin left in the Senate ought to be a warning to our party that the people demand a just fulfillment of party pledges, not miserable makeshifts.

I stated a few days ago that I did not worry as to the progress of this movement. I do not. Nor does this movement depend upon the advocacy of my gifted friend the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], the advocacy of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE], or the advocacy of any Senator. It makes its progress by the force of its truth, and, like the truth, always by the faults, the follies, the blunders, and the injustices of its opponents; and all the speeches that have been made, the millions of copies of which have been circulated, all told, will not so tell for the progress of popular government in this country as the attempt of the Executive, backed by 18 Senators, to defy the will of the people of a prospective State, and the attempt to force them to surrender their convictions as the price of statehood. Well has it been said, "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad."

Bourbonism has always stood in its own way. It never sees progress till it has been run over by it, and then too late to avail itself of the vision of that which struck it. It was true in France and Spain. It is as true in the two great political parties here to-day as it was then. It has always been a law of human nature. Bourbonism, by its blindness and injustice, has contributed to progress.

I want to say to my friend, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], I want to say to my friends here who believe in popular government, that nothing has ever happened that will so accelerate the movement as this outrage upon the free electorate of a prospective State—this effort to tempt a people to surrender their right of conviction.

So, while I deplore it, while I regret it on account of the people of Arizona, I hail it as one of the instruments that will bring the American people to a realization that we need some change in our method of government, when a President and 18 Senators can defy the will of 12,000 American citizens, even though they have not yet been admitted to statehood.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I was wondering what is the outrage about which the Senator is declaiming and against which he is protesting.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Idaho let me tell him?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I should like the Senator to tell.

Mr. BAILEY. It is a palpable coercion. It is saying to these people "You may come in if you will adopt this amendment. You can not come in unless you do." And would a vote, taken under those circumstances, be a fair expression of the popular will?

I beg pardon of the Senator from Minnesota for answering the question, but I happened to be on my feet.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, it is an outrage to say to a man, "If you will come in on the same basis as the other people of the United States came in you may, but if you want to come in as wild Indians, you can not."

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CLAPP. I want to call the attention of the Senator to this difference. If it were possible to-day for Congress itself to make the constitution, eliminating the recall as a matter of hastening the admission of Arizona, we might well support it. But that is not the proposition. We said that those people must first vote to renounce what they have already solemnly declared was their will and purpose, knowing, as every Senator in this Chamber knows, that in six months they will repudiate that decision. That may not startle some people; we may have become so used to those things; but I confess that it does somewhat astonish me that it can be seriously considered even by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. This talk about we, the people, coming from less than 25 per cent of the population of New Mexico is rather astonishing and needs some explanation. You might imagine that the vote on the adoption of the constitution represents about 99 per cent of the people, and that the other 1 per cent was sick and could not get to the election. Now, let us look at this, not in a sense of declamation, but in the sense of reason.

I have here the figures giving the population and the number of electors who might have voted on this question, and the vote; and it is interesting, in view of the remarks just made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], because he has pictured an outrage that carries one's mind back to the Kongo, and you might imagine that an entire race of people had been disregarded and swept away from their political moorings.

There were 31,742 votes cast for this constitution, the charter of their liberties that is in such danger. There might have been 80,000 votes cast, but there were not. Why not? Why did not the other three-fourths of the people of New Mexico announce themselves upon this subject when they had the opportunity and the legal right? No; I suspect that the outrage which was perpetrated, if one was perpetrated, was against the 75 per cent rather than against the 25 per cent.

This is exactly in keeping with the situation, as I stated the other day, of the demand of all this school of politicians and political agitators that the minority shall rule, and their whole protest is based upon that demand. They may not be conscious of it. It is not the first time that men did not see the full scope and to the end of their proposed political changes. Too often they are merely absorbed in the idea of a change.

Mr. President, I should like to hear from the 75 per cent of the lawful voters of New Mexico as to what they think about it. Twenty-five per cent said they were in favor of the initiative and referendum. I presume the 75 per cent did not vote because they were not in favor of it and would not vote for the constitution. I suspect that is the situation.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Idaho pardon me?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not know anything about the other percentage, except I know they did not take enough interest in the question to vote one way or the other.

Mr. HEYBURN. That may not be the reason.

Mr. CLAPP. I am more interested in the 12,000 in Arizona who went out and did vote for this than in any percentage that remained at home.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think it is a perfectly legitimate conclusion that they did not approve of the constitution.

Mr. CLAPP. Why did they not express themselves as disapproving it when they had the opportunity?

Mr. HEYBURN. Probably they might have been influenced to some extent by their anxiety to become a State. They certainly did not give their affirmative judgment in favor of the constitution. They were unwilling to do it. The presumption is that when men have an opportunity to express themselves under responsible conditions they will do it.

Now, this question was not new to them. They had been, to my knowledge, more than 20 years trying to erect a State, and they have not yet succeeded in qualifying for statehood. So that is the situation as to New Mexico.

As to Arizona, the votes cast on the adoption of the constitution were 16,000, and that is a little less proportion of the vote. I have the figures here and can give them accurately. The returns of the Thirteenth Census give Arizona in 1910 a total population of 204,354, of which 155,550 are native born and 48,804 foreign born. Of this population 118,576 are males and 85,778 are females. The total number of white males over 21 years of age is 65,133, of which number 39,427 are native born and 5,896 are naturalized citizens. So the total voting population is 45,323. There were cast for the constitution 12,187 votes and against it 3,822 votes, or a total vote of 16,009—that is, about 35 per cent of the vote. Now, I should like to hear as well from the 65 per cent who did not vote on this constitution in Arizona.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. REED. If the Senator desires to hear from the 65 per cent in Arizona, I can tell him how he can hear from them. The joint resolution which was passed and vetoed by the President did resubmit to all the people of Arizona the question of the recall of judges. If, therefore, the Senator will vote with some of the rest of us, if we ever have the opportunity to vote, to override the President's veto, he will give to that 65 per cent a chance to express themselves.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, why should they bother about expressing themselves under that joint resolution when there is no penal clause in it? It does not provide that if they do not adopt it they shall not come in.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator maintain that an American citizen can not be trusted to express his opinion unless he has a penal clause that lashes him to the polls and coerces him to the performance of his duty?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, that is a rather interesting question. If I were on the Chautauqua I would take up the subject whether or not some such condition as that might be brought about; but I am not.

Mr. President, I do not think any improvement has been made in either of these measures by the attempted changes. In the case of New Mexico they place the constitution on a par with the acts of the legislature. There would be no stability about a constitution of that kind. This joint resolution proposes that the amendments may be proposed by a majority of all the members elected to the legislature, and that they may be adopted upon reference to the people. So it is really a referendum. All it amounts to is a referendum of constitutional provisions.

In regard to the Arizona constitution it still contains the clause authorizing the recall of members of the legislature. I discussed that question on a former occasion in discussing the joint resolution that is now somewhere. It contains a recall of the members of the legislature. As I said on that occasion, you could defeat the election of a United States Senator, unless the constitutional amendment, that is also somewhere, were adopted, when the legislature would have nothing to do with it.

But so long as the legislature is the medium through which membership in this body is determined, if you can recall 5 days after their election and the campaign is 30 days long—that is, not less than 20 nor more than 30—the whole legislature would be out campaigning to know whether or not the recall should stand, during which time, of course, there would be no election of Senators or anything else; there would be no legislation. Then the provision would allow an immediate recall of those who were elected in their stead and they would have to go campaigning.

O Mr. President, I have thought of this question night and day. It has appeared in so many phases, all of which were ugly, that it is not worth while to attempt in a brief period even to present them. It is an attempt, unwittingly, I think—I do not want to be harsh; I am not going to be personal—but it is an attempt to destroy this Government that is like the attempt of a child to pull over a statue. The child does not intend to destroy the statue; it does not know, perhaps, that it will be injured by being pulled over; but nevertheless the result follows. Now, here are a lot of carpenters undertaking to tamper with the work of trained builders. They do not know the result that will flow from their act.

Under this recall system or under the initiative and referendum there would not be time to put in any wheat; there would not be time for anything but politics. Elections would be the order of the day, and all of the great economic questions that we have been discussing would become of minor importance, because nobody would have time for anything except holding elections—elections for the purpose of nominating somebody for office, elections for the purpose of electing officers, elections for the purpose of determining whether they should be recalled, only a few days to elapse between, and then elections to determine whether or not the successors should be recalled; then elections to determine whether or not the legislature should pass a law; then elections to determine whether or not, after a legislature had enacted it, it should be a law; and so on. There would not be days enough in the year; the saints' calendar would not be comparable with it.

Mr. President, are men going mad? Are we going to substitute the functions of citizenship as applied to government for the functions of citizenship as applied to the great civil, personal business of the country, substituted so that our whole time will be occupied in these questions?

Every sane man is in favor of a reasonably long tenure of office. Every sane man realizes that the agitation of these questions disturbs business that is to be affected by the proposed change and that is affected by the agitation.

To-day the great enterprises of the country, personal and collective, are almost at a standstill. Inquire of any man acquainted with business conditions and see what he has to say about it. The question is what condition will confront them to-morrow, and they marking time in the business world to-day. Just read the markets of industrial stocks, commercial stocks, from day to day. As I said the other day, from figures given me by one capable of making figures accurately, in that week $90,000,000 had been clipped off of the value in the market of those securities and debentures that represent investment of capital. I asked a man capable of knowing why. He said, "Just adjourn Congress and go home and let us know what the law is going to be for one year; we will settle down and do business; but," he said, "we do not know whether if we buy to-day some other man will buy to-morrow on more favorable conditions and wreck us or not. We do not know if we enter into a contract to-day whether we will be able to keep it six months from now, because of this discriminatory legislation that is sought to raise one man and lower another and play seesaw with the business conditions of the country."

We are confronting that, and things are, as they say, "in the air" in a business way. I am talking about business as affected by the menace of wild propositions, some of which go to the extent of threatening the Government itself, attacking the courts, so that men do not know whether to-morrow they will have a court of a fixed tenure, established procedure, and determined power to protect them in their contractual and business rights or whether they will have a court that can be removed or recalled at the whim of a mob. We read a few days ago a lesson on impulse, the impulse that carries people temporarily away from their moorings and where they forget country, and law, and friendship, and humanity, and God. They forget them all. Ordinarily, many of them are average citizens.

Mr. PENROSE. Composite?

Mr. HEYBURN. They are good average citizens ordinarily, many of them. In such periods time is not always measured by hours. We had three or four years of political hysteria and insanity that appalled the sensible thinking people of this country. I do not know that it made much impression upon the minds of those who were engaged in the mischief. They were so overjoyed with the fact that for the first time they were being taken notice of that those who survived it perhaps did not realize what they were doing.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] talks about the American people. I have seen a mountebank in the days of free silver and in the days of greenbackism stand on the street corner and talk about the American people, and you would think that he was the whole American people in composite. He would talk about the wrongs of the American people and the injustice, when all the wrongs that fell upon him were because of his laziness and his desire to run some one else's business, having none of his own. The American people will never all become insane. Some of them are.

The Senator spoke about the wrongs that we were inflicting upon a sovereign State. I repeat what I said the other day, there is no sovereignty in New Mexico or Arizona except that of the United States Government. The people are not sovereign in those Territories.

The Government could say to them: "Move out of there; we are going to make a forest reserve of you." I am surprised that it has not already done so.

Mr. President, there is no sovereignty being attacked by those who oppose this legislation. If those people want to assume the duties of sovereign citizenship, let them give Congress, where the responsibility rests, evidence of their capacity to exercise the rights and perform the duties that belong to sovereign citizenship. They have not mentioned their duties. All of the utterances that have gone out from them have been about their rights. That is the creed of the Socialist. No one ever heard a Socialist talk about his duty. There never was anything written in a Socialist platform or spoken by a Socialist speaker about the duty the citizen owes to anybody or anything; it is all a question of his rights.

No man in this world has a right that does not owe a duty. They are one the counterpart of the other. The right of citizenship in these Territories is to be conferred upon them, if they ever have it. The duties of citizenship must be performed by them by maintaining a republican form of government.

The Senator from Minnesota said, as I understood him, that he would care nothing for their principles or creed; he would take them in without inquiry. Now, I do not want to state the Senator too strongly.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I do not object to the Senator ever getting hysterical about the country going to the bow-wows and expatiating every two or three days on that subject, but I insist he shall quote a Senator correctly. I never used any expression of that kind and never thought of such an expression.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the Senator talks about getting hysterical. I had, when I took the floor, some difficulty in getting down from the heights where the Senator had carried me. It reminded me of something. I was in a court room once and heard one of the most eloquent and able lawyers at that bar I have ever known. He was a great speaker. He could go up higher and stay there with firmer wings than any man I have ever listened to. He left his case upon this high plane and sat down. There was a young lawyer of lesser experience who had been following him and going breathless up this elevation. He tried to start where the other one left off, and his waxen wings melted. So I took that as a lesson. All through life I have tried to avoid being tempted to start up where the other one left off.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the Senator may not have essayed very lofty flights, but certainly he has essayed some very lengthy ones here. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEYBURN. That is funny, and there are a lot of people who think it is funny. I do not suppose they expended very much gray matter before they laughed. They laugh first and think afterwards. Well, that is all right. It is the doctrine of some people. I am performing what I conceive to be a duty. I am pointing out for those who are intelligent enough, and have common sense enough to understand it, some reasons why this measure should not be enacted into law; and I care nothing for the silly cackle of those who will laugh at some man's attempted jest and forget the argument against which the jest is directed. Now they can laugh again.

Mr. President, I do not want to see this proposed law enacted, but it is not because I do not want these people to become citizens of States. I have always been in favor of admitting them if they were sane enough to come in as other States and maintain a government as other States. We want no freak States; we want no children that think they are wiser and smarter than their parents. We want them to come in on an equal footing, and not on a superior footing, with other States. We do not want them to have a license to disregard the principles of our Government that another State does not have and does not want. The thing they are clamoring for is a license, not rights. They want the license to be unpatriotic. They want the license to disregard the duties of citizenship. They want the license to disregard stable government. They want the license to be different from those principles that have made this country great.

Do you suppose we would have had a Government to-day had the original 13 States adopted such a constitution as this? We would have had no Government to talk about. I can not even picture what the result would have been. You get an initiative and referendum in the United States and it will be the end of our Government. All this talk about being afraid of the people is done for the purpose of distracting the mind of the unthinking or little thinking from the real question. I am not afraid of the people.

I understood the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] to suggest that no Senator had stood in his responsible capacity in this body and stated that he was opposed to the initiative and the referendum and the recall. If I have overlooked that I am surprised. I think I have stated it. I will state is now. I am unqualifiedly opposed to the initiative and to the referendum, singly, each, or double. I am unqualifiedly opposed to the recall under any circumstances, except through the medium of impeachment under the laws that govern trials for impeachment. I have been always opposed to them, and I will be always opposed to them.

If it was intended to suggest that Senators had their ear to the ground to determine from the tread of the people the direction they were moving, I disclaim it. It is utterly immaterial to me whether the people of my State send me back here or not. They can do just as they please about it. I told them the same thing the last time they sent me back. They send me here as their representative. I did not come here of my own volition. It may be that is plain enough.

This direct primary is the beginning of what I will not call a trinity, because it has so many heads and wings and branches that I will call it a composite political figure. They start out proposing to change something because they could not reach their ambition unless there was some change in stable, strong government. They must first break down the conditions. It is like a man crying fire in order to distract the attention while he picks somebody's pocket. That is the spirit behind the direct primary. They could not get the confidence of the assembled intelligence of a party in a State, so they say, "Well, we will go around the back way and we will be seekers for office rather than men selected by the intelligence of a State or a county for the position." To-day it is the man seeking the office. He says he is a candidate. He does not wait for somebody else to say, "Will you accept the responsibility of this office and perform the duties as a public-spirited citizen?" He does not wait for that. He says to the people, "I am going to take this office if I can get it, by a scheme or otherwise."

Now, that is the direct primary for nominations. It makes two elections. It doubles the expense. Men can spend $200,000 in one primary election. Yet it was to be a poor man's manner of getting into office. They said that only the rich and influential got in through the conventions. There is a great show for a poor man to get nominated in these days at the direct primary! Instead of going to the men who are charged with the responsibility of the hour to nominate a candidate, he makes a campaign in a State and spends all the money he can dig up. Then when he is nominated he is not nominated by any party or to represent any principle. After he is nominated he goes into what they call a platform convention, and half a dozen men get together and make a platform. The men who voted for him do not know whether he is for or against this or that. He is for or against it according to the geography that happens to be his environment at the time when he is asked the question.

Now, when any other Senator charges that no Senator on this floor has expressed himself on that question, he can read back in the RECORD and find out what one Senator thinks about it.

That is the direct primary. The initiative proposes that 5 per cent, generally, of the people may say to the legislature, "You have got to spend the time that the people are paying you for in considering the will of 5 per cent of the people"; and that 5 per cent will probably be the cranks in the community. That is where the initiative comes from—it comes from the cranks.

Intelligent men and strong men, men strong enough to be in the legislature or to know what constitutes intelligent legislation, do not need any initiative. The people will select them under normal conditions to initiate legislation. But no; they must send up this measure. Then the legislature must stop everything else and they must deal with the suggestion of the 5 per cent of cranks. Then, if the legislature submits it to the people, you have got to have an election on it.

I introduced here the other day a ballot 7 feet long and 14 inches wide, and it is printed as a public document. That was the actual ballot used in one of our great sovereign States at the last election. No man can read it; the clerk, with all his skill, at the desk can not read that ballot in less than 45 minutes. Yet, the elector goes into the box under the austerity of the system and must determine a law there that probably if you would submit it to five lawyers and give them an hour to consider it, no two of them would agree as to its effect or as to its wisdom.

They do not leave it to the legislature to send it to a committee, to have the committee consider it deliberately and then to bring it onto the floor of the legislature and have it discussed, but they send it out to be voted for down in the river wards, up on the mountain sides, or wherever it may be. Men must vote upon that, and if they adopt it as a law, all the people are bound by it. That kind of legislation belongs to the disorganization of government and not to its organization.

In the first place, there is no occasion for it, and, in the second place, it is affirmatively dangerous. So many of my acquaintances and friends have seemed to concede it that I feel some hesitancy about expressing myself as strongly and as plainly as I feel upon the subject. I used to doubt the sanity of a man who talked greenbackism, and I do yet; I have not changed my mind. I doubt the wisdom—that is, the conservative wisdom—of men who favor the initiative, the referendum, and the recall. This joint resolution provides for the recall of all State officers except judges.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. All public officers.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of the State.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of the State.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; of all public officers. It provides for their recall by about the same proportion of the citizenship as voted for these constitutions—about 25 per cent. They could find 25 per cent of the people of New Mexico and Arizona who did not care or who did not know any better than to vote for these proposed constitutions. They could find about that same per cent to vote for the recall of the best man who ever occupied a public office.

I will say to the Senator from Michigan that I do not regard this joint resolution as an improvement upon the other, because it contains the same evils as existed in the original constitutions which were sent up by those Territories. I can not support it, glad as I would be to see those Territories come into the Union. I spent some part of my life down in that country about 30 years ago; I know something of the frontier and of the character of men who settled it, but this was not sent up here by the stalwart, sensible frontiersmen. It was sent up here by that class of men whom we denominate on the frontier as "Johnny Come-latelies." They came down there, some of them, so as to be on hand when the band wagon came along. That is the reason they went to those Territories.

Mr. President, I have expressed my disapproval of this measure so far as speech is concerned, and I shall continue it when the roll is called.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I regret very much that the joint resolution as it was passed some days since has not been acted on in the other House, where almost three-fourths of the body were in favor of its passage originally, so that the Senate might have voted and admitted these Territories to the Union under the joint resolution as it was sent to the President. The legal number of votes in the other House to pass the joint resolution over the President's veto were cast for it when it passed that body, and the legal number of votes were cast in the Senate when it passed the Senate to pass it over the President's veto, so that more than two-thirds of both branches of Congress are in favor of passing the joint resolution in the form in which it passed Congress a few days since. Why the other House has not acted on the veto message, which was sent to that body, I am unable to say.

I do not think I can vote for any resolution admitting these Territories until action has been taken by the other House and by the Senate upon the veto message of the President. There is a very radical difference between that joint resolution and this one. That joint resolution provided that the recall of the judiciary should be again submitted to the people of Arizona for their judgment. The purpose was that that policy alone, unincumbered by any other provisions, should be submitted to the people of the Territory, in order that they might determine whether they desired to incorporate it in their constitution. They were to exercise their rights and their judgment unhampered by any restriction, and if they saw fit to adopt or reject the proposition it was for them to determine, as it related wholly and exclusively to their local affairs. The President has seen fit to refuse his approval to that proposition, and has declared that, so far as he can prevent it by the exercise of his constitutional prerogative, the Territories shall not be admitted as States unless the people conform to his notion as to what they ought to do in regard to the tenure of office of their judges. To my mind it is an arrogant presumption upon the part of the President of the United States.

It is admitted by all that, after either of these Territories has been admitted as a State, the people have the right to incorporate into their constitution the exact provision which the President demands shall be stricken out, and for any man, regardless of his great power or authority, to undertake to impose his preconceived notions in regard to the term of office of a local officer, be he judge, prosecuting attorney, sheriff, or governor, is a new proposition in American politics. If my memory serves me aright, it is the first time in the history of this country when such a restriction has been imposed upon a Territory that was seeking admission as one of the States of the Union.

I want to read the requirement which this joint resolution proposes, but before doing that I want to suggest that I fear there is a hesitancy on the part of the other House, as I believe there is on the part of many Senators, to vote to pass this joint resolution over the Executive veto.

Why should we hesitate to express our opinions any more than the President should hesitate to express his? Why should a Senator, occupying the independent position that he does, hesitate to express his views, contrary though they may be to the opinions of the Chief Executive of the land? Has the President any superior authority over us that we should bow to his will any more than that he should bow to ours? We have the same constitutional rights, only it takes a larger majority to pass a measure over the veto than it does to pass an original proposition.

I have been anxious for the joint resolution which has been vetoed to be submitted to Congress. I want to see the roll called and see the men who have changed their views, if there are any such, because of an adverse opinion expressed by the President. It seems to me, however, that this joint resolution has been interjected here and is being pressed, I fear, for the purpose of avoiding that disagreeable experience upon the part of some of the Members of the other House and some of the Senators.

I want merely to read what we are imposing upon the people of Arizona. They voted for their constitution and they passed it by a vote of almost three to one, containing a provision for the recall of all officers, including judges. We proposed in the original joint resolution that they should vote again upon the recall of judges, so that it would be clearly understood whether or not they were in favor of that specific thing. Now we propose this:

If a majority of the legal votes cast—

I should like to have the Senate pay close attention to this, because it contains an important provision.

If a majority of the legal votes cast at said election—

That is, the election at which this recall provision of their constitution eliminating the judges is submitted.

If a majority of the legal votes cast at said election upon said amendment shall be in favor thereof—

We are saying this to a people three-fourths of whom, approximately, have declared that they are in favor of the recall of their judges—the said canvassing board shall forthwith certify said result to the governor of the Territory, together with the statement of votes cast upon the question of the ratification or rejection of said amendment; whereupon the governor of said Territory shall, by proclamation, declare the said amendment a part of the constitution of the proposed State of Arizona, and thereupon the same shall become and be a part of said constitution; and if the said proposed amendment to section 1 of article 8 of the constitution of Arizona is not adopted and ratified as aforesaid then, and in that case, the Territory of Arizona shall not be admitted into the Union as a State, under the provisions of this act.

That is, it is proposed to coerce the people of this Territory and say to them, "You have got to vote this provision out of your constitution or you can not come into the Union." Anyone who is acquainted with the practical result of such an election, in view of the tremendous inducements that are offered these men to vote against their convictions in order to secure statehood, knows that they will bow to the inevitable, that they will eliminate the recall provision from their constitution, regardless of their conscience or their judgment, that they may come into the Union. It is a system of coercion in regard to a local matter that serves no great moral purpose.

The provision objected to fixes the tenure of office of the judges of the State according to the judgment of a majority of people of the State. For one I can not see how I can vote to impose such a restriction upon the free will and judgment of a people in regard to their own local affairs.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate a moment only. I presume that the committee has dealt with this matter in the most practicable and the best way possible under the circumstances, and that the only practical way of securing the admission of these Territories at this time is the method adopted by the committee. I do not, therefore, criticize the action of the committee. I want, however, to make a few remarks before I cast my vote, in view of the joint resolution as it now stands.

The joint resolution that we passed some days ago provided for the submission of the question of the recall of judges as a separate proposition to the people of Arizona, and they were to be permitted to vote upon that question without the embarrassment of having their admission into the Union depend upon whether they voted one way or the other; in other words, the resolution as passed a few days ago gave them the right to vote upon this as a separate and distinct proposition, but the right of admission to the Union did not depend upon the result of the vote. I was not afraid then, and I am not afraid now, to submit this question, after thorough discussion, to the people of Arizona.

I stated in the remarks which I made at that time that I was voting for that resolution for the reason that I believed that that was the fairest way in which to test the question of whether or not the people of Arizona were truly in favor of the recall of judges, for it is evident, Mr. President, that if the majority of the people of Arizona are in favor of the recall, the method which we are now adopting will only serve to admit them into the Union, and then and thereupon they will resubmit the question and adopt it.

The difference between the two propositions, to my mind, is that of imposing, as it were, an element of duress upon the voter and that of leaving an election entirely free and clear of all questions, except the one question of whether the people of Arizona are in favor of the recall of judges.

Mr. President, while I propose to vote for this resolution, as it is the only thing, I presume, that can be done now in the way of assisting these Territories into the Union, I have not changed my mind as to the better course, which I believe is to submit the question to the people as a separate proposition. I would like to test it in the tribunal of final appeal. I sincerely regret that we are not permitted to do so.

I have always felt, and I feel still, that had it been submitted in a fair and intelligent way, reposing confidence in the intelligence and in the judgment of the people, after thorough discussion they would have eliminated it themselves from their constitution. I have always found, both from reading and from observation, that in the settlement of great fundamental, governmental, nonpartisan questions the best way is to take the people into your confidence, discuss the matter with them, and depend upon them to decide the questions in a proper way. That in the tribunal which must at last determine all such questions.

One of the objections to the present course, to my mind—and it is one which presented itself at that time—is that there will be added to the situation after they come into the Union, the impetus which is given by reason of the resentment, which must necessarily to some extent arise because of the manner in which they are compelled to deal with the subject. I regret, to some extent, while I am anxious to see the recall provision eliminated, that it was not submitted under such conditions as it could be said that it was trusted to the intelligence and to the judgment of the people of Arizona to settle it, because, Mr. President, no question like this, involving the thought and the consideration of earnest men in all parts of the country, and involving, as it does, a most serious proposition of government, can possibly be settled other than by a thorough presentation of the matter, upon argument and upon reason, to those who must ultimately settle it, namely the voters of this country.

There was another proposition which, to my mind, was equally controlling, and one which induced me to vote against the amendment at that time proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and that is that, to my mind, it violated the most fundamental principle of this Government, namely, the right of local self-government. I know it has been said here repeatedly, and only a few moments ago, that the right of local self-government does not obtain as to these people, because they are yet within a Territory.

But, Mr. President, when we passed an enabling act and authorized these people to meet in convention for the purpose of forming a fundamental law under which they should live, the principle of local self-government obtained from the time that they met in that convention. They were just as much entitled to the protection of that principle and to be guided by its healthy and wholesome rules from the time they met and formed that constitution as they would be if they should meet next year after they are a State to re-form and recast that constitution. They were then engaged in forming for themselves, at our suggestion and at our request, a constitution under which they should live, a constitution which should guide them as a State, and from the moment they met in constitutional convention every principle of the right of local self-government obtained as to those people.

The only way known to our system of government by which to eliminate from the constitution of a State an objectionable provision is by an appeal to the judgment and to the intelligence of the people who are to live under it. It is my opinion that if this question could have been submitted after arguments pro and con upon this matter and after the presentation of the views of those who have given it consideration, it would have prevailed unquestionably with the people of Arizona, and the recall provision would have been eliminated from their constitution.

Mr. President, if it had been eliminated in that way, if the intelligence and judgment and patriotism of the people of Arizona had said, after a fair consideration, "we do not want this in the constitution," I ask the Senate, What would have been the difference in the effect upon the country, what would have been the difference as to principle as compared with the effect which it will have to have them vote to take it out in order to get into the Union as a State? There is no one who will doubt for a moment, let the judgment of Arizona be what it will, let the convictions of those people be what they may, when the price of statehood is put upon the one side and the right to regulate their affairs upon the other, knowing that they may adopt such a provision hereafter—no one will doubt, I say, that it is no test whatever that it is eliminated from the constitution under such circumstances. We have made no progress in the settlement of this great question, and we will make no great progress in the settlement of these questions so long as we settle them under such form of settlement as to prevent a fair and intelligent and unbiased judgment upon the part of those who are to determine them. As was said by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] this afternoon, none of these questions are ever settled until they are settled right; and though we may postpone judgment for a time, the proposition will be finally settled after a thorough discussion and presentation to the people.

It is a wholesome thought, Mr. President, to reflect that in the history of our Government almost every, if not every, great question of government which has ever been submitted to the people, after a thorough discussion and presentation, has been settled in accordance with the best interests and according to the truest principles of representative government. Perhaps the most inspiring and assuring incident was the adoption of the Constitution of the Federal Government itself. When the convention which framed it adjourned it is safe to say the majority of the people were against it; but after months of discussion they adopted it. There have been times when passion and prejudice for an hour prevailed; there have been times when calmness and deliberation were prohibited by reason of temporary conditions, but those questions that have come up and through the course of months or years have been submitted to discussion and finally to decision, have been settled in accordance with the best interests of the Republic. There, Mr. President, is where all these questions will finally have to go. That is the tribunal to which we will have to finally appeal, and there is no use for the Congress of the United States to undertake to settle questions of local government, because the final tribunal, the one to which the appeal will be made, is another tribunal, and that is the tribunal in the respective States where the votes are to be counted for or against the proposition.

It was for this reason that I was in favor of submitting it as a single proposition, unembarrassed and unencumbered by the price of statehood, for when the price of statehood goes into the controversy, the result of that election amounts to nothing as to the settlement of the questions in which we are primarily concerned. I realize, however, that under present conditions this is the only way by which we can carry out our pledge to admit these Territories as States into the Union, and I shall therefore vote for this resolution.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to place in the RECORD two telegrams, one from J. P. Dillon and J. H. Robinson, and another by M. G. Cunniff and H. R. Wood, of the Yavapai County Statehood League, of Arizona, in which they ask for the passage of this measure substantially as it is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the telegrams will be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams are as follows:

PRESCOTT, ARIZ., August 16, 1911.

Hon. R. L. OWEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Democratic Party of Arizona is eternally grateful for the statesmanlike action of the Democrats of House and Senate in passing the Flood resolution. The responsibility for nullifying it is now on the President alone. We now earnestly beg you, if the bill can not pass both Houses over his veto, to amend the Flood resolution in the single particular of making the elimination of the judiciary recall mandatory, and pass it again before the special session ends. The President's action, following the stand the Democrats took for Arizona, relieves the Democratic Party of any responsibility for the coercion, and Arizona will go overwhelmingly Democratic. The people of Arizona and the Democratic Party earnestly petition you thus to give us statehood.

J. P. DILLON,
Chairman Territorial Democratic Central Committee.

Attest: J. H. ROBINSON,
Secretary.

PRESCOTT, ARIZ., August 16, 1911.

Hon. ROBT. L. OWEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

If Congress can not pass Flood resolution over President's veto, the people of Yavapai County ask you most earnestly to give us statehood, but through the Flood resolution, amended only in the judiciary recall feature, and in no other. We pray you to take this action during this special session. The people of Arizona thank you heartily for standing by the Flood resolution, which was what they desired.

THE YAVAPAI COUNTY STATEHOOD LEAGUE,
By M. G. CUNNIFF, Chairman.
H. R. WOOD, Secretary.

Mr. OWEN. I do not wish to detain the Senate any longer than possible at this late hour.

In discussing the initiative and referendum several days ago, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] pointed out that in his State plate matter was being sent out free of cost to the country newspapers containing an argument against the initiative and referendum. I received his morning from Michigan an editorial of like purport, which I desire to place in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the editorial will be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial is as follows:

[From the Evening Press, Thursday, Aug. 3, 1911.]

TAINTED NEWS AGAIN.

When one is offered something for nothing it is justifiable to seek the motive. The smaller newspapers of this country are being offered something for nothing. The donor is a Chicago newspaper syndicate service, and it is offering a page of plate matter containing Senator SUTHERLAND'S speech delivered in the Senate July 11 against the initiative, referendum, and recall. SUTHERLAND, of course, is a reactionary, and the special interests' friends are his friends.

Now, one would be very simple, indeed, to suppose that the syndicate, a business institution which exists for the sole purpose of making money, is being so generous with its own cash. Some one else is paying for this plate, some one who is interested in the discrediting of progressive measures that are intended to restore government to the people, and in the choking off of "agitation" against excessive tariff rates. It is not costing any small sum to print this plate and distribute it throughout the country. The "some one" concerned hopes to get a definite return for this generosity. Just leaving the tariff alone is worth millions to the interests concerned.

Who is paying the bill? Not SUTHERLAND. But it doesn't matter much so long as the public that has this tainted news thrust on it by editors easy enough to "bite" on this bait realizes that it is being paid. The trouble is that the general public is not aware of how crooked and devious are the tricks of privilege.

Every newspaper editor of Michigan who receives this very generous offer not only should refuse it, but he should lose no time in telling his readers what he thinks of it.

Mr. OWEN. I also offer an article on Why courts become unpopular, and which illustrates the reasoning of the people which has led to this demand for the recall of judges, which I should like to have go into the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Let the article be read.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to have the article read from the desk. Several Senators would like to hear it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the last article will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the article, as follows:

WHY COURTS BECOME UNPOPULAR.

The other day a Federal judge holding court in New York City fined a lawyer $45,000 for organizing wire pools. The district attorney begged for a jail sentence because the lawyer was, in his estimation, a dangerous criminal. He had dragged into illegal combinations honorable men who had no intention of doing an illegal act. When they became suspicious he told them he had consulted the Department of Justice and it had approved. Nevertheless the judge let the man go with a fine.

Not long ago he did send a man to jail for three months. He was an importer, on a small scale, of dates, figs, and cheese from Greece. He tried to cheat the customs, as others have done, and got caught at it. Probably he deserved what he got. But when this same judge had to pass on the same day on the case of a millionaire importer of millinery and dress goods mixed up in frauds which had cost the Government a million and a half, he was let go with a $25,000 fine, though a jail sentence was asked for.

The man was the less deserving of leniency because he had jumped his bail, fled to Europe, and remained away for months.

Earlier in the year another Federal judge sitting in New York City refused to send to prison a wealthy art importer who had swindled the Government out of millions, on the ground that he was in ill health, and imprisonment might kill him.

When the people see men who have stolen a few hundreds of dollars or less sent to prison, even when they are in ill health, while wealthy malefactors who have stolen millions escape, they begin to doubt the existence of "even-handed justice." It occurs to them that judges might have a better sense of proportion in awarding punishments if they were subject to some degree of popular control. They commence talking about the recall to rid themselves of judges who know not justice. For that talk and the new-fangled judicial recall device some judges are responsible.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, stripped of all verbiage, the meaning of the veto of the President because of the "judicial recall" in the Arizona constitution is a declaration on the part of the Chief Executive that he is unwilling to admit Arizona and New Mexico to enjoy the rights of self-government on an equal footing with the other States of the Union as guaranteed by the Constitution, because Arizona proposes to exercise this right in a manner the Chief Executive does not approve.

It is not pretended that the "judicial recall" is in violation of the Constitution of the United States, of the Declaration of Independence, or of the enabling act.

The President thinks the judicial recall is not wise "governmental policy," and therefore he refuses to allow a sovereign State to exercise its own right of self-government, because, in the proposed exercise of this right, the people do not yield to his views. He thinks Arizona should be denied statehood because, under its constitutional right of self-government, they favor the judicial recall. His sole justification for denying Arizona its right to statehood on an equal footing with the other States of the Union is because, in the exercise of such right, they adopt the judicial recall by the vote of the people. He does not approve this. He says that, in his opinion, it "is destructive of free government." The fact is such a veto is "destructive of free government." To deny the right of free government to a sovereign State by veto as a condition of its admission on an equal footing with the other States is a grave wrong done to "free government."

It is an unwarrantable attack on the fundamental right of self-government, which I deeply regret.

Arizona proposes the freest government in the United States, giving the majority of the people of the State the right to amend their constitution at will; to nominate, elect, and recall their own officials. If they find the judicial recall inexpedient, under the free government of Arizona they can amend it at any time. Thirty-two States of the Union provide in their constitutions for the recall of judges by the address of the legislature. Forty-three States provide the automatic recall by short tenure, but the recall by popular vote, although conceded to be a right which other States have, which Oregon has long enjoyed, and which California is about to adopt, is to be denied Arizona, and her people are to be denied the right of self-government because they have dared to adopt it.

With profound respect for our Chief Executive, I deem it my duty to say that the veto is not justified, for the simple reason that the people of Arizona, under the right to be admitted on an equal footing with the other States in the Union, have a right to govern themselves in their own way without the interference or coercion of the Chief Executive of the United States.

The power of the Executive is so great, since a minority of the Senate can sustain the veto, that he is able to coerce Arizona by his veto, to coerce Congress by his veto, into requiring Arizona to strike out the judicial recall or remain out of the Union.

It is not denied that Arizona will have the right legally to provide the judicial recall immediately after admission, nor is it doubtful that Arizona will immediately adopt it when admitted.

It seems to be the idea of the President merely to emphasize before the country his disapproval of the judicial recall by vote of the people, and I feel it my duty as an advocate of popular government to place on the records of the country an answer to the reasoning offered by the President in justification of the veto.

But, first, I think it proper to say that the presidential veto is not justified, even if he were right in disapproving the judicial recall. The President is in grave error to deny the people of Arizona the free and full right of self-government merely because in the exercise of their acknowledged right of self-government they do not yield to his personal views. The President is in grave error in coercing them, as a condition of admission to statehood, to submit to his will, and he does a wrong to all those who believe in the judicial recall by this abuse of the veto power, by using the powers of the Presidency and the prestige of that high office to put the seal of his condemnation on this policy of government. He does a wrong to both California and Oregon in such an unjustified veto.

The first reason offered by the President is that the majority of the people of Arizona can not be trusted to deal justly with the State judges, if they are subject to recall. He suggests that the "unbridled expression of the majority, converted hastily into law or action, would sometimes make a government tyrannical and cruel;" that the majority should be subject to checks to prevent the abuse of their power on the minority. The President says:

> Constitutions are checks upon the hasty actions of the majority. They are the self-imposed restraints of the whole people upon a majority of them to secure sober action and a respect for the rights of the minority.

The President does not trust the majority of the people unless they are obstructed in the exercise of their will by various checks and devices. This is the vital point of difference between the progressives and those who oppose the progressive movement. The progressives believe in the integrity, honesty, and wisdom of the majority. They believe that the majority is conservative. The majority well knows that it consists of individuals, of groups of individuals, and of minorities, and that the safety of the majority absolutely depends upon the protection of the individual and of the minority. It is for this very reason that the majority have always declared in favor of free religion, free speech, and every liberty justified by the rights of others. It is this clear conception of the majority that has all these years given protection to the individual by the voluntary and deliberate act of the majority. I deeply regret that our honored Executive should take the view of those who oppose the progressive movement, and should speak of the "unbridled expression of the majority," "the hasty action of the majority," and suggest that the majority might be swept "by momentary gusts of popular passion," "by hasty anger," or be moved by "firebrands and slanderers" and by "stirrers-up of social hate."

Mr. President, the sober common sense of the majority of the people, exercising its right in the dignity, quiet, and seclusion of the voting booth, is not moved by the mob spirit; it is not turbulent, violent, moved by "hasty anger" or "gusts of popular passion." The views of the majority of the people, under the safeguards of the American ballot box, is the most conservative, thoughtful, and trustworthy power in the United States, and will abundantly safeguard the right of the individual citizen to all of his rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. It is only on the majority the citizen can rely. The danger of the citizen is to be found in the craft and corruption of the few, of the minority, who have by indirection and by checks on the majority usurped undue power in the governing business.

The danger of this country lies in the governmental control by minorities and by the agencies through which they operate, including a judiciary nominated by privilege and kept in power by craft.

Our honored Chief Executive suggests that "often an intelligent and respectable electorate may be so roused upon an issue that it will visit with condemnation a decision of a just judge." I emphatically deny it. An "intelligent and respectable electorate" will not visit with condemnation a decision of a just judge at any time, much less with frequency or "often," as our honored Chief Executive imagines. The majority elects and reelects and continues to reelect just judges in our numerous States, and the more just the judge the more certain is his reelection. Not an instance can be given of a judge defeated by the people because of his upright conduct.

The idea that the majority of the people will be moved by "hasty anger" against a faithful judge executing the law laid down by the representatives of the majority has no just foundation in fact. The majority of the people will never be moved by hasty anger to deal unjustly with a faithful public servant. The majority moves only too slowly in dealing with unfaithful public servants, and this is manifested by the experience of the governments of many of the cities of the Republic and of the States where it frequently happens that organized criminal minorities, engaged in the governing business for profit, are permitted for long periods of time to pursue their bad conduct without being called to vigorous account by the justifiable anger of the majority.

The President thinks the judicial recall is "destructive of free government." The people of Arizona, like Oregon and California, familiar with gross judicial abuses and a control of the judiciary in California by the Southern Pacific Railroad, believe the judicial recall an essential part of free government.

But whether the people of Arizona or the President be right, there is no doubt whatever that the people of Arizona have the right to determine this matter for themselves, and that the Chief Executive has no right to coerce them in the matter of their own self-government. The President has raised the issue as to whether or not the people of Arizona should have the right of self-government or whether they should be denied this right, and on this issue, I think, the President is in error to deprive them of the right to govern themselves merely because they do not propose to govern themselves in accordance with his opinion.

The second point which the President makes is that the judges, under the judicial recall by a vote of a majority of the people, would be so intimidated that they would become "timeservers and trimmers." The President says:

> The character of the judges would deteriorate to that of trimmers and timeservers, and independent judicial action would be a thing of the past.

Mr. President, the character of our State judges, who are elected by the people for short terms and who are subject to automatic recall and who are subject to recall by the legislatures without impeachment and without assigning cause for recall, shows that the President's anticipations are not justified. Our State judiciary is well deserving of the commendation which even the President generously gives.

The people ordinarily select good men for judges, and the judges in the very great majority of cases, under the system of popular election and short tenure, have not become "trimmers and timeservers." The recall of State judges is so rare I do not remember a single case in recent years. Undoubtedly they are subject to the influence of sound, matured public opinion, and it is only right that they should be. All men, whether judges or not, are subject to the influences that surround them, and it is this very fact, which the President so strongly emphasizes—that the judges are subject to influence—that makes it of the greatest importance that the influences which do environ the judge should be good influences and not bad influences.

The very reason the people of Arizona demanded the judicial recall by popular vote grew out of the experience in California, where the judges were under the influence of the Southern Pacific Railroad. Privilege can exercise its influence in a great variety of ways. For example, it can skillfully bring about, by machine methods, the nomination of a man and the election or appointment of a judge whose previous predilection is altogether favorable to privilege, though not understood by the people.

Privilege can, by the hypnotic influences of skilled social and personal agencies, lead the mind of a man away from the people and into the service of privilege, and since judges are equally subject to the crafty occult influences of privilege, as well as to the influences of public opinion, we must choose which of the two influences shall prevail. Those who believe in the progressive movement prefer the influence of the people to the influence of privilege. I believe that the American people, when they have considered this question, will decide that since the judges are more or less subject to influence, it is better to have them subject to the conservative, honorable, wise, and just influence of public opinion rather than to have them subject to the crafty or corrupt influence of privilege without any power in the people of a direct remedy. Between the influence of privilege and the influence of the people, I stand firmly for the influence of the people, and this I regard to be the vital issue in dealing with the control of the judiciary, whether in the State or in the Nation.

It is this difference in the POINT OF VIEW BETWEEN THE PROGRESSIVES AND THEIR OPPONENTS THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES MUST SETTLE.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed as a Senate document an abstract of the argument on the recall of judges which I delivered some days ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order for the printing thereof will be entered. [S. Doc. No. 99.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think the wisest and most beautiful part of our governmental scheme is the fact that we are a Republic of Lesser Republics and that all sorts of governmental experiments can be tried out on a limited field without affecting the welfare of the entire Nation.

I am perfectly willing to see Arizona try any governmental experiment that she desires to try, provided only that it is not an experiment in its nature violative of the Constitution of the United States and that it does not involve in its nature the destruction of a republican form of government in the States.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that the President of the United States in his veto message, unofficially received, has made any argument that is germane to the case under consideration.

The question before us is not the wisdom or the folly of the recall of judges. It is the wisdom or the folly of permitting and not interfering with the right of local self-government upon the part of the people of Arizona. In my opinion the most sacred thing in the world next to personal, individual self-government is community self-government, especially under our scheme of Government.

I do not believe that the President ought to have predicated his attack upon the sovereign rights of the people of Arizona, if Arizona is to become a sovereign in the Union, upon the nongermane ground of his opposition to the judicial recall. As far as my individual opinion is concerned, so that I may not be misunderstood, I do not believe in the recall of judges. I sometimes suspect that there must be a form of popular brain storm and that that must be one of the results of it. Some of these days in the future when the common sense of mankind has been improved to such an extent, far beyond what it is now, as that the commonalty itself may be a fair judge of judicial ability and judicial capacity, it may be well to have something of that sort, but I do not believe that we have yet reached the stage in the progress of average human intelligence when it is safe to go that far.

But that is not the question at all. The question is whether the United States Government, through its Congress and its President, has a right to fix as limitation upon a new State entering the Union anything which a State already existing in the Union is free from as a limitation. If New York to-morrow wanted to pass a statute or a constitutional provision for the recall of judges New York could do it. Massachusetts could do it, Kansas could do it, Mississippi could do it, and Missouri could do it; and there is no moral or civic right on our part to admit into this "indestructible Union of equal and indestructible States" a State upon conditions that render her powers of sovereignty even apparently inferior to the powers of sovereignty of any State in the Union already admitted.

Here, at any rate, "equality is equity," and inequality is injustice.

The Congress of the United States tried that in the case of the State of Mississippi back in reconstruction days, and so far as I know inaugurated the idea of putting into enabling acts some sort of pretended or assumed limitation upon the power of equal States. It said that Mississippi should not be readmitted to the Union except under the provisions of a reenabling act, and that enabling act provided, among other things, that Mississippi should never at any time adopt an educational qualification for suffrage. The time came when Mississippi in her majesty and power and intelligence chose to do what the Congress of the United States said she could not do, and she did it, and the Supreme Court of the United States upheld her right to do it, because, the Supreme Court said, Massachusetts has an educational qualification, Connecticut has it, California has it, and it is not given to the Congress of the United States to deny to any State any power which any other State has.

Mr. President, that was an act of tyranny in the case of the State of Mississippi, partisan tyranny, to perpetuate negro rule and Republican ascendancy, and in my opinion this limitation upon Arizona is an act of Federal tyranny and Federal usurpation of authority.

I am well aware, of course, of the familiar argument that since we have to pass upon the act admitting a State, we have a right to pass upon its wisdom; and that the power rests with us I have no doubt; but to exercise a power which is in itself powerlessly exercised is folly. If Arizona wants recall of judges or any other form of governmental insanity, if you consider it such, she has a right to have it, provided it is not violative of the Constitution of the United States, and provided that it safeguards a republican form of government, which this undoubtedly does. She can do it five minutes after she is admitted. If that be, as it is, her right after entering the Union, it is her right on and while entering the Union.

I shall vote for this joint resolution because it emancipates Arizona from all except constitutional limitations by making her a State, and I hope that when she is emancipated and becomes a State she will not adopt the recall of judges; but if she does choose to do it, in her right of self-government, it is her affair. The most sacred thing in the world is the right of self-government, and it is accompanied, necessarily, by the risk of self-misgovernment, which is itself a quasi right.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I fully agree with the view expressed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] as to the character of the provision for the recall of judges. I can not, however, go with him in his view of our duty in regard to the admission of the Territory of Arizona as a State with a provision in her constitution for such a recall.

I do not think that the joint resolution now before the Senate requiring Arizona to eliminate from her proposed constitution the provision for the recall of judges is any interference with any right of local self-government. Arizona is not now a State. When she becomes a State, she will have a right, I agree with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], to adopt a provision for the recall of judges. It will be no concern of ours. She will have a right to be as wise or as foolish as she can and as she wishes. We not only will have no right to interfere, but we will have no power to interfere with her in the making of such provisions when she has become a State and has acquired the right of local self-government as a State.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator from New York think that the Congress of the United States could be justified morally in fixing any limitation upon the power of a new State which could not be fixed upon the power of an old State?

Mr. ROOT. Morally? No. I think the Congress of the United States is bound to accept in good faith and in accordance with the spirit, as well as the letter, the provision that all States shall be equal, with equal rights and equal powers; and the instant that Arizona has become a State she is emancipated from all control in respect of all that vast field of local self-government which belongs to the oldest and the most powerful State in the Union.

But, sir, Arizona is now a Territory. She has not the right of local self-government. We are engaged in determining the conditions upon which we shall give her that right. We are engaged in determining the conditions upon which that 200,000 people, who at her election cast 16,000 votes upon the adoption of her constitution, shall send to this Senate as many Senators with as great a voice and as effective a vote as the 9,000,000 people of the State of New York, the 7,000,000 people of the State of Pennsylvania, the 5,000,000 people of the State of Illinois, and the 4,000,000 people of the State of Ohio. She has not local self-government to-day. She is subject to our Government. We have said by solemn statute that "we will admit the Territory of Arizona when emancipated from our control, provided she adopts and sends to us a constitution which we approve."

Now, sir, I differ with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] in this: It seems clear to me that in the last act which the Congress of the United States performs in the exercise of its plenary control over the Territory of Arizona, acting under the statute which requires us to approve or disapprove the constitution upon which she appears here and asks for her release from our control, we shall act according to our own judgment and our conscience and require that constitution to be one that we really and in truth approve.

When we have done that, when under a constitution that we do approve we have emancipated her from our control and made her a State, the next day, if she chooses, she may begin the process by which she can amend her constitution and include in it any provision whether we approve it or not. But until that moment comes the responsibility is with us, the power is with us, the duty is with us to say that this Territory shall follow the rules which we believe are essential to the maintenance of a free, orderly, just, civil community. As I believe one of the rules necessary to answer that description is the rule which provides for an independent, impartial, and courageous judiciary, I shall vote for the joint resolution now reported.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, just one word, and only one word. The argument of the Senator from New York is substantially this, that while it would be very unjust and very wrong to cut a child's hand off after the child was born, it would be perfectly right to do it immediately before the child was born. It seems to me that the point at which we begin to meet the question of statehood is the point at which we admit a State and not the day after. It seems to me that we owe a respect to the equality of the State that is superior to our own private opinions as to how the State should exercise its power, and that we owe that to the State while it is being born, and not merely after it is born. It seems to me that there is no distinction possible between Arizona and Arizona, between Arizona two minutes before and two minutes after she is born to statehood. Arizona is Arizona. I understand, of course, that as long as the State is under Territorial government it is a Territory, and that it is subject to, or has been claimed to be subject to, the plenary power of Congress, although that "plenary power" over a Territory I have contended is not "plenary"; but call it by that name, if you choose. Even that power is subject in its exercise by Congress to certain general principles, and one of those general principles is that you shall commit no inequality among equal sovereigns or any injustice. When you commit the inequality upon a Territory which is being born as a State, cutting off its wrist or putting manacles upon it in a Union where the other States have preserved their wrists and have no manacles placed upon them, you are carrying "the plenary power" of Congress over a Territory over into the area of its statehood; you have passed the natal threshold.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, it appears to me that a more apt illustration would be a guardian who, because his ward immediately after becoming of age and acquiring entire control over his property may squander it, justifies himself in permitting the infant to squander it before he becomes of age. It seems to me that the guardian must perform his duty up to the point where the infant is emancipated. After that point is reached the adult man may work his own will.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, Mr. President, but what would be thought of a guardian who undertook in the writing to emancipate a ward to limit his emancipation, and in the writing of emancipation itself manacled the ordinary individual citizen's right of the allegedly emancipated ward? The Senator from New York seems to forget that this is an act of emancipation. It is not the last act of Territorial government; it is the act of emancipation itself.

Mr. ROOT. It is our last act of government over the Territory. I never knew of a guardian manacling his ward, but the guardian may, under certain proper circumstances, exercise restraint over a ward. If the circumstances justify it, it is proper for the guardian to exercise that restraint. The instant that the guardianship ends and the ward attains his majority he may put an end to the restraint; and that is the case here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, Mr. President, but the difference is this: The Senator says that the instant the guardianship terminates the restraint terminates. If he were to follow that analogy in this case, assuming ourselves to be guardians for the Territories, there would be no quarrel between us. But he wants to follow his restraint beyond the moment when Arizona becomes a State. He wants to make an enabling act of Congress restrain and manacle Arizona for some time, I do not know how long, beyond her becoming emancipated and becoming a State. Whether it is one hour or five hours or five months or six months it is equally wrong in principle, because Arizona has a right, if she have any right to enter the Union at all, and we have decided that, after the consideration of her population, degree of preparedness, and so forth, then she has a right to enter the Union as the equal of New York, as the equal of Mississippi, as the equal of Missouri, as the equal of Michigan; and it is not right, in the very first moment, to manacle her hands because we are afraid she will misuse her hands, except in so far as the Constitution of the United States already manacles them.

Mr. ROOT. We do not manacle Arizona, Mr. President. Arizona has no right to enter the Union. It is for us to say whether she shall enter it or not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I admit that.

Mr. ROOT. The very instant that she has entered it her hands are free to make such constitution as she sees fit to make.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, Arizona has no right to enter the Union except by our permission. But Arizona, having her right to enter the Union acknowledged by us, must enter it—has a right to enter it—as an equal State, and we have no right to make her entrance, by our limitation, that of an inequality.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. OWEN. I call the attention of the Senator to the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, which gives Arizona the right to be admitted as a State.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the sense in which the Senator from New York used the word "right." Of course, every Territory of the Union has a right under our spirit of free institutions at some time to enter the Union. But I understood him to mean that it is a right which she can not exercise without our permission, which is absolutely true, of course. She has no legal right to enter the Union without an act of ours, but in entering the Union she has the right to enter it equally, which is a totally different proposition.

Mr. ROOT. There is no right to enter the Union equally or in any other way. There is a right upon becoming a member of the Union to be equal, and that we secure to her by this joint resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And there again, Mr. President, I would change the verbiage used by the Senator from New York. I would not say she has that right "upon" becoming, but she has that right "in" becoming, not "after" becoming but "while" becoming.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the right of the Territory of Arizona to be admitted as a State has been so strongly presented and the provisions of her constitution so ably defended that I would not arise at this late hour of the debate except for the fact that certain arguments advanced against the constitution are, in my opinion, unsound, and various inaccurate statements regarding the terms of that constitution have (of course inadvertently) been made.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], whom I sought to interrogate yesterday, and who, in substance, declined permission, discussed the constitution of New Mexico and presented the view that it is so complete and perfect an instrument it should be accepted without qualification or amendment. In contrast with the constitution of New Mexico he argued that the constitution of Arizona was unfair, inequitable, and dangerous.

In substantiation of this charge he called attention, if I correctly understood him, among other provisions, to section 8 of the Arizona constitution, and claimed that it unjustly discriminated against the Spanish inhabitants of the Territory. The section referred to reads:

Eighth. The ability to read, write, speak, and understand the English language sufficiently well to conduct the duties of the office without the aid of an interpreter shall be a necessary qualification of all State officers and members of the State legislature.

This provision of Arizona's constitution is condemned, and in the same breath eulogy is pronounced upon the constitution of New Mexico, it being exploited as of such perfection that any amendment is undesirable. Now, let me read you section 5 of the constitution of New Mexico.

SEC. 5. It is hereby provided that the ability to read, write, speak, and understand the English language sufficiently well to conduct the duties of the office without the aid of an interpreter shall be a necessary qualification for all State officers and members of the legislature.

Thus we find that the constitution of New Mexico, which was declared to be a perfect instrument, expresses the identical idea in the identical language which we find in section 8 of the Arizona constitution. Yet the Arizona constitution is condemned because it contains this language, while the New Mexico constitution is praised, although its section 5 is identical with section 8 of the constitution of Arizona.

The reason both constitutions employ the same language is easily discovered. We have only to examine the enabling act which was passed by Congress. The people of these Territories had nothing whatever to do with writing the enabling act. Certainly they were not responsible for the language to which I shall call attention. Section 5 of the enabling act expressly provides that the constitution of Arizona and the constitution of New Mexico must contain the following provision:

SEC. 5. * * * the ability to read, write, speak, and understand the English language sufficiently well to conduct the duties of the office without the aid of an interpreter shall be a necessary qualification for all State officers and members of the legislature.

Thus we find the Congress of the United States initiated this provision. Thus we find Congress imposed upon these Territories the acceptance of this specific language. Thus we find that both Territories, being helpless in the premises, accepted the language which Congress dictated. Yet the prejudice of some Senators on the other side condemns the people of Arizona for placing in their constitution the very thing we compelled them to there place. At the same time the same prejudice enables these same Senators to accept with commendation and praise the constitution of New Mexico, although it embraces the same language used in the constitution of Arizona, and although that language was forced into both constitutions by Congress.

Mr. President, I have referred to these contradictory positions merely to illustrate how far prejudice can run, especially when yoked with partisan interest.

Here is a further example: By its terms the constitution of Arizona provides that it may be amended by the majority of the people at an election duly held, provided, however, that the proposed amendment shall have first been agreed to by a majority of each branch of the legislature, or the submission thereof shall have been demanded by 15 per cent of the voters by petition duly filed.

Is this latter provision an extreme or radical proposition? Does it destroy the stability of the proposed constitution? I think not. It has been charged that if the people are given the right by popular petition to demand the submission of an amendment to their constitution or laws, they will be kept in incessant turmoil, elections will be held every few months, all sorts of fantastic and senseless propositions will be forced upon the electorate, and thus the stability of the constitution and laws will be destroyed. I do not agree with these views. They are in conflict with the experience of those States which have adopted similar provisions. In my own State the people by constitutional amendment reserved to themselves the right to initiate a law. The initiation provision only requires 8 per cent of the legal voters of two-thirds of the congressional districts.

Notwithstanding the fact that this right of the people has existed for nearly three years, it has been exercised but once, when an amendment relating to prohibition was voted on at the time of a general election. That was a question which, of course, has always aroused great public interest.

The reason the initiative has not often been employed, and will not be often employed, lies in the fact that no man or organization of men will take the trouble to secure, or, indeed, be able to secure a petition signed by any considerable per cent of the people of an entire State unless a matter of grave importance, reaching into every home and touching the life of almost every citizen is pressing for attention. Hence I say that all declarations here and elsewhere made to the effect that the people will be kept in constant turmoil and be required to vote at frequent intervals is not sustained by experience. Such declarations are mere vaporing of extremists—the result of exaggerated imagination.

The point I want to emphasize is that the Arizona constitution is so drawn that it can not be amended hastily, thoughtlessly, or without due consideration. On the contrary, care has been taken to insure deliberate judgment and afford the amplest opportunity for the fullest discussion. At the same time the instrument is so constructed as to forever retain in the hands of the people the right to change their fundamental law. Thus they have made the constitution not an unyielding and inflexible chain to bind and circumscribe their liberties, but rather a fortress which protects their rights. This thought runs throughout the instrument and characterizes its every article. Singular it is that such a constitution finds so little favor upon the other side of this Chamber. Even more singular is it that those who oppose Arizona's constitutional magna charta can accept without criticism and swallow without grimace the constitution of New Mexico. It is exactly to their taste. It possesses that particular flavor of repression which delights a standpatter's palate. Yet I declare there has never been an American State, there has never been a free people who have adopted a constitution and placed so many restrictions upon the amendment thereof as you will find in the proposed constitution of New Mexico. That constitution is indeed marvelously well built for those who do not believe the people can be trusted to govern themselves. As one reads the astonishing amendment provision he is forced to conclude that its framers believed that "all wisdom, all learning, all gift of prophecy," had descended upon them.

We can not escape the opinion that the members of this convention really thought they had broken the locks of time and ravished the casket of the future of its last jewel of wisdom. Really, these gentlemen must have conceived that no man yet to come upon the earth could possibly produce a single thought which might improve upon their marvelous masterpiece. And so believing that their little constitution fixed the boundaries of human intelligence, entertaining the illusion that they had surveyed and located the horizon of the philosophy of government, these legislative architects sought to make their handiwork eternal. They therefore sought to make it—as the laws of the Medes and Persians—so that it "could not be altered."

Media and Persia, the only countries that ever enacted unalterable laws—swiftly their national race was run. In lust and blood, in cruelty and crime, the ghastly history and tragic end are briefly chronicled. It is a tale of altars erected to superstition, temples dedicated to sensuality, thrones maintained by armed force; government by brutal tyrants over abject slaves—a black page, splashed with blood. The unalterable statutes were chains despotism forged for freedom. The monarch who oppressed and the serf who wore his legal gyves were alike powerless to defend their country against the first vigorous assault. The backs which had bent before authority were so weak they could not sustain the burden of battle; the hearts broken in the mills of tyranny were not stout enough to endure the terrors of war—so Media and Persia fell. The heaven-challenging walls of their mighty cities, their lofty towers, their frowning battlements, the throne of monarch, and the den of slave all disappeared in one vast cataclysm of horror.

Where now are the unalterable laws of Media and Persia; where the civilization that did not admit of change and the government that defied progress and set its iron heel upon the people's liberties? Above them all the dust of time lies thick, the desert sands drift in dismal heaps, and the wild beasts lie in wait for passing prey—the very place where once they were was lost for centuries. Only the curiosity of the antiquary has discovered and deciphered their laws, which serves no purpose save to prove the ignorance and cruelty of those who wrote them thinking their handiwork so divine that it were sacrilege to change a syllable. Cambyses, Cyrus, Darius, Xerxes, Smerdis, and all the bloody tyrants of those unfortunate lands doubtless (like the framers of the constitution of New Mexico) were opposed to the initiative, the referendum, the recall. They were in truth against all amendments whatsoever.

For a moment let us examine the amendment clause of this remarkable New Mexico constitution. If possible, let us discover why Senators upon the other side hold it in such high regard, why they so love an instrument that denies the people of that great Commonwealth the opportunity to ever rectify any mistake now made or to take a new step in advance, if peradventure the march of events shall lead to higher moral ground or loftier intellectual altitudes.

New Mexico's constitution provides that before an amendment can be submitted it must be approved by two-thirds of all the members of each branch of the legislature. Mark you, not a majority, but two-thirds; and notice further, not two-thirds of the members present and voting, but two-thirds of all the members. So that a minority of even less than one-third in either branch of the general assembly, aided by the accidental absence or the illness of a few members, could effectually bar the people from an opportunity to vote upon an amendment, no matter how grievous the emergency nor how universal the demand.

Second. It is provided that once in eight years a majority of both houses can submit amendments, but if the legislature unfortunately neglects to act at that time, or the amendment when submitted fails for any reason, then for the succeeding eight years the people are again relegated to the two-thirds rule.

If this were the end of the restrictions, they would be sufficiently onerous and dangerous. A further examination, however, shows that when once an amendment has run the gauntlet of the legislature and escaped with its life the people are not yet permitted to vitalize it by a majority vote, for the constitution further provides that it must be adopted by—an affirmative vote equal to at least 40 per cent of all the votes cast at said election in the State.

That restriction, Mr. President, means that in all human probability there never will be a constitutional amendment adopted at any general election held in the domain of New Mexico. I assert this, because it is the experience of States that a constitutional amendment submitted at any general election rarely, if ever, receives the vote of 40 per cent of all the people voting upon the candidate who receives the highest number of votes. This transpires because some voters are indifferent, while many more in the haste of casting their ballots simply forget to vote on the proposed amendment. So here is a second obstacle almost insurmountable.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that in this case the 40 per cent not only applies to the State, but to a majority of the counties, or to half of the counties.

Mr. REED. I am coming to that. But, Mr. President, we do not end with this remarkable restriction. As suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma, the amendment must be voted on not only by 40 per cent of all of the people of the State who vote for any candidate, and receive a majority of such vote, but it must also have been voted on by 40 per cent of those voting in at least one-half of the counties. Then, and not otherwise, is the amendment adopted. What does that mean? Simply this: That when a constitutional amendment is proposed in New Mexico—

First. If the total vote cast upon that amendment is not equal to 40 per cent of the entire vote cast for the highest candidate, it will fail.

Second. If it is not voted upon by 40 per cent of the vote cast for the candidate receiving the highest vote in one-half of the counties, it will fail.

Third. It must have a majority of all the votes cast.

It will be observed that under this arrangement an amendment might carry in the State at large by an enormous majority and fail because it did not receive a vote equal to 40 per cent of that cast for the candidate receiving the highest number of votes; and even if it did receive such a majority in the State at large, it might fail because it had failed to receive a vote equal to 40 per cent of that cast for the highest candidate in one-half of the counties of the State.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator further yield?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to point out to the Senator the historical fact that the vote by which the constitution of Texas was adopted was only a little over 4,000; and under this rule the constitution of Texas would not have been adopted.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. Every Senator here who has had constitutional provisions submitted in his own State recognizes the fact that it is the rule that less than 40 per cent do vote upon such propositions.

No better illustration of the absolute fatality of such provisions is needed than the vote cast by both New Mexico and Arizona in adopting their present constitutions. The total voting population of New Mexico is 55,878; the total number of votes cast for the constitution was 31,742. The total number of voters in Arizona is 26,367; the total number of votes cast for the constitution was 12,187. This light vote was cast notwithstanding the fact that the people of these Territories had for years groaned under the oppression of Federal carpetbaggers, notwithstanding the fact that the two constitutions had been discussed and every incentive exhausted for a full vote.

But, Mr. President, these are not the only limitations. It is further provided that not more than three amendments shall be submitted at one election. No matter what the emergency, no matter how imperatively necessary, no more than three amendments can be submitted.

Let me make this suggestion to every Senator who has stood and fought the battles of the people, to every Senator who has witnessed the devious processes which can be employed by great interests to obstruct legislation: Here are three propositions essential to the people of the State; here are three propositions upon which the people of the State desire to vote; but only three can be submitted. Interested parties could very easily get through the legislature by some subterfuge or other one or two or three amendments upon immaterial matters, and thus thwart the will of the people and deny them the opportunity to vote upon the essential matters which they desire to have enacted into law.

Then, Mr. President, we find still further restriction in section 2, where it is provided that a constitutional convention can not be called for 25 years unless three-fourths of the members elected to each house, and after the expiration of 25 years two-thirds of the members elected to each house shall deem it necessary. If this almost impossible obstacle is passed, still the convention can not be created unless at a general election a majority of all the electors voting at the election in the State, and also a majority voting in at least one-half of the counties thereof shall vote in favor of calling the convention. Then and only then can the people have a constitutional convention.

But, sir, the amendment must not only receive a majority of the vote cast in the State, but it must receive a majority in 50 per cent of the counties. After all this has been done, after those desiring to re-form the constitution have complied with all these onerous restrictions, you will find it still further provided:

If this constitution be in any way so amended as to allow laws to be enacted by direct vote of the electors, the laws which may be so enacted shall be only such as might be enacted by the legislature under the provisions of this constitution.

In other words, the wise men who drew this organic law placed the constitution like an iron band around the brain, the ambition, the hopes, the desires of the people of that State. Even when granting them the right of the referendum vote, they did it in a qualified manner and specified "that though you do adopt the right of referendum, you shall not exercise that right save in accordance with the dictates of this instrument which we have this day in our wisdom enacted." And so they wrote the following:

SEC. 5. The provisions of section 1 of this article shall not be changed, altered, or abrogated in any manner except through a general convention called to revise this constitution as herein provided.

First, they make it almost impossible to call a convention at all; then they make it almost impossible to ratify the act of the convention; then they provide that certain portions of this constitution can only be submitted in that way. The hand that penned that instrument was the hand of a man who would have made an ideal minister for George III of England. It does not belong to a man who lives in the twentieth century and believes in American principles of government; either that, or it was guided by those selfish interests which distrust and despise the people.

Why is it—I put it to the gentlemen upon the other side and to their vacant chairs—why is it that the constitution of New Mexico so well suits in its flavor your legislative palate? Why is it that this instrument which puts bands about the people, that says to the unborn children of New Mexico, "You shall be held in thrall by this instrument" finds "favor in your eyes"? Of course, I except from these strictures the distinguished son of Minnesota, Mr. CLAPP, who has so eloquently spoken and will so eloquently vote in favor of a human constitution, adopted for human beings, calculated to meet human conditions; I except from criticism these Republican Senators who indorse the sentiment expressed by Mr. CLAPP. Such Republican Senators, however, are unfortunately limited in number.

Why is it many Republican Senators so love to tie the hands of the people? Why is it we hear from that side of the Chamber constantly invective delivered against mob rule? Why are we constantly warned by Republican Senators against the unwisdom of the people? Why is it they think the people can not be trusted to enact legislation? Why is it they fear the people will destroy the fundamentals of free government? Why do you upon the other side incessantly cry, "Beware of the people; they will destroy governments; they will substitute the will of the mob for the science of statesmanship; they will tear down the temples of jusice; they will uproot the tree of freedom"? Why are these sentiments constantly and forever upon the tongues of Republican standpatters, always, of course, uttered in covert language and disguised by soft phrases? Do you, in fact, believe the people incapable of self-government?

Why, sirs, how got you here? Every man who honestly sits in this Chamber was sent by the votes of these despised people. Every man who came here honestly and is entitled to retain his seat is here because he received the votes of a legislature elected by the sovereign people of his State. That legislature was only the people's agent, was created by them, and if it acted justly it simply registered the people's will. Sometimes I wonder how it happened in the providence of God that these ignorant people, these people who know so little, these people who are referred to as "the mob," these people you say you can not trust to erect and maintain a free government, these people whom you insist must be bound by the inflexible chains of an inflexible constitution in order that they may not injure themselves, these people whom you treat as lunatics who must be watched, guarded, circumscribed by legislative straitjackets and confined in constitutional padded cells—I often wonder how it happened they were so wise as to pick the illustrious, great, and wonderful men of this body. I am still more astonished to know how this ignorant mob happened to elect members of a constitutional convention who were so wise they could gaze down the path of the future, discern the emergencies hidden in the womb of the oncoming centuries, and provide for them all in one unalterable instrument.

Mr. President, it is constantly asserted here, first, that the people are wise, that they are prudent, that they are patriotic, and in the next breath we are told they are foolish and that they can not be trusted. Why, sirs, it is argued that the people are so foolish that if they have a recall they will elect a man to-day and to-morrow they will compel that man to run for office again by getting out a petition of recall at the behest of his successful adversary, and that they will have nothing but elections, and nobody will have time to sit in his office and perform its duties. Mr. President, that hypothesis is based upon the assumption that the people are either dishonest or foolish and incapable of self-government. I say there is not a community in any State of this Union where if a man were fairly and honestly and cleanly elected to office, either judicial or otherwise, and his disgruntled antagonist were to circulate a petition to recall him, that would not defeat the man who resorted to such indecent methods by 10 votes to 1, because he had resorted to them.

Assume that this people are wise, assume that this people are patriotic, assume that this people are decent, and you have assumed the impossibility of the dangers depicted.

Mr. President, I have listened to some of these arguments with astonishment. I join with the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] in saying that no man will go further than I am willing to go in favor of preserving the integrity of our judiciary, in favor of preserving its independence, in favor of keeping the temple of justice always illumed by the light of reason and of law; but that is only possible when you put men upon the bench who are above sinister influences. If you put weak men there, influence will reach them. If you put dishonest men there, corruption will eat into their hearts and taint their decisions. Whenever American manhood sinks so low, whenever it becomes so contemptible that the self-interest of a judge will sway his opinion, you have reached a point when you will have no courts that ought to be respected. When you assume that judges will be intimidated by fear of a recall, you assume they are unfit to hold the office and they ought to be recalled.

Mr. President, let us see where this analysis will lead us. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] pronounced a eulogy upon the bench. I join in that enconium. It has been the patriotism, it has been the intelligence, it has been the sense of justice dwelling in the hearts of American judges that has made American courts places where people resort in the hour of their adversity. It is this superb quality which has made them respected. But is the determining cause to be found in the fact that the judges hold their positions so securely that no one can deprive them thereof? The argument that has been advanced runs something like this: "Judges are wise, judges are prudent, and judges are patriotic, so patriotic, so wise, and so prudent that about them we should draw the veil of sanctity and bow and worship at the judicial shrine." In the next breath these same eulogists in doleful voices exclaim the judges are of such human clay, they are of such poor fiber, of such small capacity, at heart so vicious, in brain so shriveled, that should their personal interests be affected in the slightest degree they would venture from duty and even sacrifice the angel of justice upon the altars of selfishness.

Thus these eulogists of the bench in fact declare when they say that rather than submit to the chance of a vote by the people, the judges would pollute the temple of justice and inflict cruel wrongs upon those who sought the protection of their courts.

Mr. President, no such arraignment of the judiciary of this country has ever before been uttered; an argument so foolish and so self-contradictory has seldom fallen from the lips of man. It is equivalent to saying in one breath that a woman is a paragon of virtue and in the next breath declaring that for a paltry bribe she would sell the jewel of her honor. That sort of argument does not comport with the high ideals that we have always held of the American judiciary.

I take it that this is true of the judges of our courts—not without exception, for there creeps here and there into the very holy of holies that which should not come—but it is true, as a general proposition, of the judges of our courts, that they have been educated in the law, they have learned to reverence its great principles, they know that upon its just interpretation rests the progress and success of their country. So, because they love justice and love their country and love their profession, they sit and do that which they believe is right. In the vast majority of instances they would do justice even at the price of their own degradation in the eyes of the public. The only man who is fit to be a judge is one who will do his duty, regardless of the question of recall, regardless of all questions, as God gives him light.

If judges are so weak that they can not be trusted to stand and do their duty, even though they are likely to be recalled, then the thing we ought to do is never to have an elective judiciary, because the judge might decide cases in order to be reelected. That argument condemns an elective judiciary. They ought to hold for life when appointed or elected, because otherwise, being weak and human, they might decide cases in order to carry political favor to themselves. That has been the argument of every man who has ever stood and demanded a life tenure of office for judges. That argument applies as well to all officeholders. It has been a favorite theme of every tyrant who ever sat upon a throne.

Ah, Mr. President, if you are going to adopt that system, you ought to carry it further; you ought to appoint judges for life, make them unremovable; and you ought to go still further and take away the temptation of promotion, because the temptation to accept reward in the way of promotion is just as powerful a motive in the human breast as the fear of losing office by a recall. Yet we have not constructed even the Federal judicial system upon that basis. There is but one man living in all this land who has reached the altitude of judicial honor, namely, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. All others have the hope of reward by further promotion ahead of them; yet has that condition tainted their decisions? Has that led them to debase their high offices? I think not, sirs; it does not so impress me.

Then, again, if we would remove the judges from all influence we would have to eliminate from their minds, their brains, their souls, that human element which, from the cradle to the grave, goes with every human being—the desire to be thought well of by their fellow men. You can not eliminate that. Should you be able to do so, you would have left a monster bereft of every human attribute. The hardest task ever performed by a judge is to render a just decision which may visit upon him the obloquy or contempt of those men whose opinions he respects. The loss of good will much more affects the honorable man than the loss of a salary. You can not possibly remove judges from all influence. They are the subjects of influence, and to some extent they always will be. They all hear voices. The question to be determined is, What voice shall they hear? Shall their ears be tuned to catch the cry of the people or shall they bend toward the aristocratic and sinister influences which always draw near where power is granted without responsibility?

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD], who spoke this morning, well illustrated how it is possible to have judges who are beyond the reach of the people and yet do not, because of that, reach the high altitude of judicial rectitude. I could imagine nothing that would more fit the ideas of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], as he portrayed them here, than to have judges created as they were in Dakota before it came into the Union. There the judge was appointed by the President; he was sent into a distant State where he had never lived; where he never expected to permanently abide; where he did not know anybody; where he had no enemies to punish and no friends to reward. He was a mere judicial carpetbagger, carrying his authority under his hat. He was backed by the Army and Navy of the United States. He neither owed his place to the favor of the people nor did he fear the power of their recall. Such a judge occupied the ideal position of independence, so dear to the heart of the Senator from New York. And yet, sir, from the lips of the Senator from South Dakota came the protest, and from the lips of every Senator who has ever lived in a Territory has come the same protest against the arbitrary and unjust action of many of the judges thus created and circumstanced. The truth of the matter is that in this free country, where we elect men to office to represent and to protect us, there is only one source to which they should ever look. They should look, sir, to the people themselves. He who metes out justice so that it shall conform to the best sentiments of a great community, who administers law so that the weak and the lowly, the rich and the powerful among whom he lives, must say he has done justice and has decided the law, is responding to a sentiment which will not often lead to wrong. The people love justice. The people believe in fair play. The people believe in the enforcement of the law, for public law is but public opinion crystalized into statute.

Mr. President, there are a great many foolish doctrines now being expounded, and none more foolish than the deification of judges. Who are these judges? They were once babes "mewling and puking" in some good mother's arms; they went through all the ills of childhood; they had the measles and the mumps, the same as other mortal children; they went to college, and were mixed up in the scrapes and escapades of the ordinary college student; they became lawyers—just ordinary lawyers—they practiced their profession; they struggled with adversity and aspired to prosperity; they tried to get cases, and endeavored to conduct them as well as they could. Some day it became necessary to elect a judge. Then the lawyer called on the politician, or had some friend do it for him. Just as other mortals, he solicited political endorsement and support. At last his name was put upon a slate in a convention held by the dominant party; he was nominated; he did not then hesitate to subscribe to the campaign fund; neither was he backward in soliciting the votes of the wicked people; he schemed and worked just as the other ordinary candidates on the ticket schemed and worked in order to attain a victory, and he was tickled to death when he received enough votes to elect him. When this John Smith, the lawyer, went from the bar to the bench did Almighty God suddenly change his nature? Did some wonderful and divine influence, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, transform him into a different man, or did he ascend the bench the same human being, with the same human limitations, the same human passions, the same human frailties—the seeds of which existed in his soul at birth and which had accompanied him even to the hour of his election? Let those who have practiced at the courts answer the question at the bar of their own conscience. I want to say this, however, in justice, so that my views may not be misconstrued, nor my language misunderstood: The traditions of the bench are so exalted, the high responsibility of the office of so grave a character, the love of justice innate in a human heart so profound, it has nearly always happened that when John Smith, the lawyer, became John Smith, the judge, he would at the same time become a just and upright judge, following the light of the law and pursuing the path of equity. But it does not follow that, therefore, we should bow before him, play the part of sycophants, and ascribe to him infallibility. Neither does it follow that we should class all judges with John Marshall, which I think has, in effect, been done here to-day. I would not criticize that great man, but yet I feel very sure that at least one of even his decisions wrought incalculable harm to the Republic.

Mr. President, the fact of the matter is that our courts are only human things. They make not only one mistake, but tens of thousands of mistakes and blunders. No man has ever practiced long at the bar who has not arrived at the conclusion that the best lawsuit he ever took into court was, after all, largely a gamble; and no man has ever practiced long who will not say, if he will give his honest judgment, that the opinion of 12 common, ordinary men, drawn from the body of the county and sitting in a jury box, is more likely to be just than the decision of any judge who ever sat upon a bench in any court. That is so much a part of our fundamentals that we wrote into the Constitution of the United States a provision to preserve the right of trial of fact by the common people of this country. The men who wrote the Constitution did not believe that all wisdom and all virtue were wrapped up in the men who happened to be elected or appointed judges.

I say now we might just as well quit talking about the bench of the country as a holy of holies that can neither be contaminated nor led into error. I can take the decisions of any court which has been organized for fourscore years, and I can present to you not tens but hundreds of overruled cases. Every overruled case is a solemn certificate that the court was wrong before or is wrong then.

Mr. President, when you talk, then, of recalling judges, you do not talk of destroying courts. It is one thing, sir, to maintain that the President's office is a sacred thing. It is one thing to go upon the field of battle and die to preserve the Chief Executive office of this Nation. It is one thing when the President has acted within the law to bow to that law which represents the majesty, the soul, and the conscience of our race, and it is quite another thing to treat the occupant of the office as a man who is above criticism. On the contrary, we do criticize. Yet I say that taking the men who have occupied the office of President, one after another, reading the long roll, they will average as high in intellect, as high in morals, as high in the sense of justice, as will the Supreme Court of the United States to-day or at any other period of our country's existence.

How are these judges made? From what holy source do they emanate? I have in mind a recent occurrence—I read it very lately—outlined in a paper published in the State of Kansas by a good Republican, now a Member of Congress. The President was about to appoint a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. There were several candidates in my part of the country, speaking generally, and this was the item:

Mr. Jones, of the Santa Fe Railway; Mr. Smith, of the Missouri Pacific Railway; Mr. Jackson, of the Burlington Railway—

And, without taking your time, there was a list of some 15 or 20 general solicitors for railways—were at Washington to-day in the interest of the candidacy of the Hon. Mr. Blank for a position upon the Supreme Bench.

And this Kansas editor remarked laconically:

The railroads seemed to be represented, but in God's name who was there to represent the people.

I do not mean by that to attack the judge who was appointed or to attack the candidate who sought appointment. I do mean to say as practical men we ought to stand and look every situation in the face just as it is. While we respect the courts, we need not at the same time say that the occupant of the bench is above the criticism of the people or the recall of the people.

Mr. President, I am not for the recall of judges as I see it now. I am not discussing the question from that standpoint. If you have judges appointed for life, I would be in favor of their recall, but when you have judges elected for short terms of office, I believe, as a practical question, that is sufficient. That is my individual view upon the question as I see the light now. But when any man undertakes to say that because the people reserve to themselves the right to recall a judge they have thereby destroyed the courts, he has made a statement which is not consistent with the facts in the case.

Let us go back to the original proposition. This is a Government of the people. If we are a bad people, if we are a weak people, if we are a people who can not trust ourselves, then King George was right, every king who ever wore a crown was right, every royal criminal who ever garbed his back with the purple of authority and laid the lash of power across the naked backs of the people was right, in holding that there should be no such thing as government by the people. But if the people are capable of self-government; if they are a wise, temperate, and moderate people; if they are a thoughtful and patriotic people, they will not destroy their courts simply because they have the power to destroy them. They could, sir, for that matter, destroy all government. They have the power. Why do they, then, establish government? Is it not because they love law and justice? Why, then, do you dare say they ever will destroy the temples of justice?

Do you believe, sir, that this people, 90 per cent of whom are ready at any moment, if it is necessary, to die to preserve the country and its institutions, would simply, because they had the power to vote a judge out of office, begin by destroying their courts? Why, sir, the sense of law and order is ingrained in the Saxon's flesh and skin; it is the dominant impulse of his soul. There never yet were a dozen Saxons or Celts together, there never yet was a congregation of a dozen Anglo-Saxons at any place on this earth which was without a government but that they began at once to set up a government of law and order. If you were to transport a thousand American citizens to Mars, and they could live in its climate 24 hours, before the 24 hours was over they would have begun the erection of a government and the establishment of courts of justice.

These people in Arizona are not different from the people of the other States. Let me say to the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] they will average as high in intelligence, in morals, in patriotism as the people of the Empire State. Let me say to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] they are very much bone of the bone and flesh of the flesh of those pioneers who went into the desert to establish the Commonwealth that is so splendidly represented by that great Senator. Let me tell you these people of Arizona are of the bravest of the American race. Let me tell you that a sponge never immigrates. It lives and dies where it was born. But the game fish finds the headwaters of every creek and river of earth. It is the men who have the courage to leave their homes and go into western countries who constitute the brawn, the brain, the sinew, the heart, and the courage of our race.

These people who have gone to Arizona carried with them the traditions of their childhood, their love of law, of order, of right, and of decency. If you were to deny them a government under the Constitution as part of this Nation, if you were to abolish your Territorial government to-day, if you were to deny them any part in the national life and cast them out to shift for themselves, they would, on to-morrow morning, begin setting up a government that would be a model of republicanism and of democracy. Their self-erected State would be a citadel and harbor of refuge for all liberty-loving people of this earth. The men of Arizona will not destroy their courts simply because they have reserved the right to recall a judge whom they believe should no longer hold office.

These people, of all the United States, are a conservative people. Make no mistake. Occasionally you hear of the mob here, and you learn of a mob yonder. You think only of the mob and of its violence. You forget the 90,000,000 of people who that day went to their peaceful toil. You forget the millions who went to the temples of worship where they could bow before the common God that rules over all of us. You forget that in every home almost they were reading the Bible. You forget that the Constitution was in the hands of tens and hundreds of thousands of them. You forget that these are the same people who, if our country were assailed, would touch elbows, stand in the crimson line, and with unfaltering souls yield up their lives that their beloved country might live on. And you say to me they would destroy their courts? That is a monstrous and unthinkable proposition. I undertake to say that if you give these people the right to recall their judges, they will never exercise that right unless some judge has done a grievous and undoubted wrong.

Sir, we have the right to elect judges in most of the States; the terms of the judges are short; they must retire or gain a reelection; that is, in effect, almost the same thing as a recall. And yet what is the history of our States? In my State it is the commonest thing to elect and reelect the judges until from youth they grow old and die in office. I have seen them hold when political revolution had swept out of power the party to which they belonged. Yet they were saved by the votes of the people.

I remember one instance in my own town when there was a political upheaval, and the party that ordinarily carried elections by 4,000 majority lost by some 5,000 to 8,000. Yet the judge of the criminal court, who had never catered to public opinion except in the high sense of doing right and justice, was reelected in the face of the tremendous tidal wave which swept over our city. It has been true of my supreme court. Judges have sat there until they have grown old in the service. They have been supported by men of both parties. It is only recently that that condition was changed, and it was changed largely by death.

Mr. President, the people of Arizona can be trusted. Even if the recall of judges be a mistake, this is the argument which prevails with me above all others. If they were mistaken when they provided for the recall of their judges, yet they have kept within their hands the power to rectify that mistake. I say to you, sir, that any intelligent people can be trusted to make their own laws for this reason: That the bad effect of a bad law falls upon them; the good effect of a good law brings its benefit to them; and as long as you will give the people who suffer from a bad law full and ample right to change that law you need not worry one moment about admitting them with a bad law.

No slave ever felt across his back the whip of a master who did not hate the whip and hate the system that made possible the lash should cut his flesh. No people ever yet enacted a law that reached down into their homes and firesides and brought injustice and iniquity upon them and allowed it to long remain, if those same people had at the same time the power to change the law.

If the initiative and the recall of judges was written in the constitution of New Mexico, where the people are practically deprived of the chance to change that instrument, it would be a different question. But, sir, in the Territory of Arizona they have provided for the recall of judges, but at the same time they have provided a means by which they can change that law, if it proves to be a bad thing for them. So I say, we are absolutely safe to grant this request of the people of Arizona.

I say again—and I should like to be answered from the other side; I invoke an answer if it can come—Why is it that this constitution of New Mexico, like a band of steel forged around that young State, practically impossible of removal, finds such favor and no criticism over there, while the constitution of Arizona, that retains these rights in the hands of the people, is subject to venomous attack? Is it a fear that courts will be destroyed, or is it a fear that a political result will be wrought out? Is it a fear that the people will have too much power and abuse themselves, or is it a fear that if you give the people power, they will protect themselves against the interests that menace this land? Do you fear to give the people who own the soil, who till the ground, the people who work at anvil and forge, the power to say how they shall be governed? Do you fear that, or do you fear that they shall be too strong for other influences to overcome them?

Mr. President, to say that the people of any American State will destroy their courts simply because they have the right to recall a judge is to say they are a people incapable of self-government.

Such an opinion, if entertained regarding the people of Arizona, reflects more discredit upon the man who entertains it than his opinion can possibly cast upon the brave and patriotic citizens of the Territory.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate another minute, except to say that these Territories have been waiting 25 years to come into the Union as States. They are qualified by education, character, and fitness in every way for statehood, and it ought not to be longer delayed.

I am doing simple justice to the occasion when I publicly acknowledge the earnest cooperation of the chairman and members of the Committee on the Territories of the House of Representatives in advancing the possibilities of statehood, as they have aided in every way in the solution of a very vexed question with the hope that we might admit these Territories into the Union now.

Mr. President, the Territories have been kept out long enough, and this bill should be immediately enacted into law and justice long delayed meted out to these deserving people. The platforms of the two great parties have declared for it. The Senate and the House, in my judgment, are ready to bestow that privilege upon these Territories, and I shall not detain the Senate another minute, further than to express the hope that we may admit them now.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, not only are the people of Arizona apparently deprived of the ordinary functions that pertain to them properly, but it seems to me that Congress also is deprived of its privileges by the situation which has developed in the course of this proceeding. When a bill of this character has been acted upon by both Houses and by the President of the United States it seems to me—and I admit my inexperience—a peculiar circumstance that it does not continue in its course so that Congress may exercise its constitutional function of determining whether or not it shall pass over the veto of the President. That certainly would be the regular procedure. Certainly it would be the inevitable parliamentary course unless the progress of the bill should, by some power vested in the organization of the one House or the other, be absolutely halted and brought to a standstill.

We find ourselves now in the situation of being confronted with an entirely new bill, cut off from the opportunity of registering our votes, whether they should be effective or not, upon the statehood measure which has occupied the attention of the country for two years.

I only rise to register a protest against that and against whomsoever may be responsible for it, whatever committee, whatever organization. The original bill should have come here for a vote. The end of it is not necessarily reached, not properly reached, when the Executive veto is attached to it. We are confronted, however, in view of being deprived of that opportunity of casting a vote here, with the alternative of keeping Arizona and New Mexico out of the Union for an indefinite period or of voting to admit them, humiliated by having a constitution, under which they must live and conduct their government, that was not adopted by themselves and of which they have expressed their disapproval.

I want again to register my position before casting my vote in favor of this joint resolution, as I shall cast it upon that question. It seems to me the entire confusion of the argument, if there is any confusion, as to the extent to which Congress may legislate its opinion into this constitution, arises from the conception expressed by the most able and distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], that in acting upon this constitution Congress is exercising the plenary power which it has over the Territories of the country. I say, I think the confusion of the situation from a legal and constitutional standpoint arises from that false premise. This constitution which we are attempting to model here, which we are modeling and remodeling, is not a constitution for a Territory. It is not a constitution which will ever go into effect in a Territory or govern the people of a Territory. The first vitality that this code of laws, this fundamental code will have, will be when it comes into effect as the fundamental government of a State.

Mr. President, if Congress has plenary power to legislate in regard to the constitution of Arizona, it is certainly not limited to the question of the recall of judges and to the initiative and referendum. It extends to every part and parcel of that constitution, and I assert that if it is the duty and responsibility of Congress to pass upon these sections of that constitution, it is its duty and responsibility to review the entire instrument and exercise its discretion as to every part and parcel of it; and, of course, it has no such power.

But once we begin to enact a constitution for a State, we ought to perform our full duty—if it is our duty—examine each section and each article of the instrument and see that it conforms to the views of Senators from other States.

I was somewhat astonished to hear the declaration made by Senators that Congress is vested with plenary power to legislate in regard to this constitution, and still more in reading in the veto measure of the President of the United States the position which the Chief Executive takes in regard to his power, which is coordinate, within its limitations, with that of Congress, and if it exists is upon the same plane, subject to the same conditions to which the power of Congress is subject.

The position of the President is this: "I must therefore withhold my approval of this joint resolution if, in fact, I do not approve it as a matter of governmental policy." That is the position the President takes. The President asserts the proposition that he is vested with the duty of determining the governmental policy for a State to be admitted into the Union and has formally expressed it in the solemn form of a veto message.

It is the first time, from what limited reading I have been able to indulge in, in the history of our Government when such a doctrine has ever been expressed; certainly the first time it has ever come from so high a source.

We hear objections made to departing from the rules which govern the Senate and the House of Representatives. How much more dangerous is it when we depart from one of the fundamental principles of our system of government and have it asserted and have it recognized, at least by inaction, that the President of the United States is vested with the power under any circumstances to determine the governmental policy of a State?

It will not do to say it does not relate to a State, but that it relates to a Territory. It does relate to a State. It does not relate to a Territory. As I said before, it never will go into effect over a Territory, but it is made, so far as we have any right to presume, for the permanent government of the people of a State.

Senators say the people can amend it. How do we know they will amend it? We are not to presume they will amend it. They may not, and it may be the fundamental law of that State for years, so far as we can consider. We have not any right to indulge in presumptions that it is not permanent.

Some Senators, I know, object to certain features in this constitution on account of the experiences which they have had with their own constituencies—that is, with the character of the population that inhabits their States, as, for instance, some of the Southern States, certain ones of the Southern States, in which we would all admit that, in view of the condition existing there, it would not be wise or practicable to vest the people with the powers that are vested in this people under the Arizona constitution.

There are certain of the great cities of this country where likewise it would not be feasible or practicable or wise to vest the population of those cities with the power of direct legislation or the power of recall. But it is for the people of those jurisdictions to determine that question for themselves if we are going to have self-government, and the people of Arizona, with their knowledge of the character of their population, have determined that they are capable of exercising these powers; that they have a population of such character that they can safely put into effect the recall and direct legislation; and for the Congress of the United States, representing the power of the Nation, to say to this sovereign State, because that is what it is saying—that is, the community, the polity which is to be affected—that they shall not determine for themselves what capacity their people have, or to what exent they can be trusted with the power of government, I say is undermining the most valuable, the most indispensable fundamental feature of our entire system of government.

The Federal Government could not possibly exist except for the reserved local powers of the States. It is a complex system. It absolutely depends for its existence upon the preservation of the powers of the States to govern themselves, and I, for one, although I shall vote for this joint resolution, do so under compulsion and because I am coerced, as other Senators are coerced, and as it is proposed to coerce the people of Arizona, by being limited to either accepting this proposition or none at all. I shall vote for the admission of the Territories upon these terms, humiliating as it is, as the only alternative of excluding them altogether.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have a very able and interesting address, delivered by invitation before the Washington State Bar Association at a recent meeting thereof, upon the subject of the recall of the judiciary, by Mr. T. J. Walsh, of Helena, Mont., one of the most profound lawyers, scholars, and students of governmental questions in the Northwest. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD as a part of the debate upon this question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be printed in the RECORD.

The address is as follows:

RECALL OF JUDGES.

[Address delivered by Hon. T. J. Walsh, of Helena, Mont., before the Washington State Bar Association, Spokane, Wash., July 28, 1911.]

The public discussion of the subject of the recall of judges has served again to bring into the limelight how widely men differ in their estimate of the capacity of the people for self-government. Not a little of it has been more or less acrimonious. The Chief Executive of the Nation finds it an innovation of so pestilential a nature as to justify the exclusion from membership in the sisterhood of States of a Territory whose people, preparatory to their entry into the Union, frame a constitution recognizing the principle. It has been even advanced that such a constitution would operate to characterize the government to come into being under it as other than republican, the form which the United States, under their fundamental law, guarantee to every State in the Union. If this view be sound, it follows that it is incumbent upon the Federal Government to interfere in some manner in the case of any existing State that shall adopt this reform, as it is denominated by its friends, until the obnoxious principle is eradicated.

The overwhelming influence of the profession of the law in every department of the Government has often been noted. It monopolizes the judiciary, as a matter of course. Of the 92 Members of the National Senate, 66 have been admitted to the bar. The lower House will show as high a proportion. The President is a lawyer, as were all except two of his predecessors for 50 years. Every member of his Cabinet but one is a trained lawyer. In a less marked degree, perhaps, but nevertheless as by far the predominating class, are the affairs of the States guided and directed by the members of the legal profession. Three of the four governors who have been elected by the people of Montana since her admission into the Union came from its ranks. It is beside the present purpose to consider why this is so. Its obvious significance is that lawyers give concrete expression to the convictions of the public on political questions, however influential they may be in its development. A general concurrence in thought, at least, must be assumed.

There is very little reason, accordingly, to fear the general acceptance of any innovations in the machinery of government that does not commend itself to the intelligent and progressive members of the bar. In the matter of the method of choice or dismissal of judges it is reasonable to believe that the usual deference paid to their views on related questions would be heightened to such an extent as to leave in their hands practically a veto upon any plan proposed. This responsibility carries with it a corresponding obligation to be informed upon any change seriously agitated. It occurred to me, following these reflections, that you might listen with some patience to a brief disquisition upon the recall in its application to the judicial office.

It is nowhere proposed to make the principle of the recall specially applicable to judges, but in the general assault upon the system it is insisted that at least an exception should be made in the case of such officers, and it is in connection with them particularly that it is urged that it offends against the requirement of the Constitution that the government of each State shall be republican in form. As to this claim there is not in it sufficient of substance on which to hang anything that can be dignified as argument. To advance it is to excite distrust of any accompanying comment on the expediency or wisdom of the proposed departure from the prevailing order. In the presentation of this feature of the subject it is usually coupled with the initiative and referendum, the group of related innovations, it is said, operating to characterize any scheme of government of which they are essential parts as democratic in form as contrasted with a republic.

In this connection profuse reference is made to comments of various statesmen of revolutionary times, warning or denunciatory in character, on the evils and perils of unrestrained democracy and on the necessity of an independent judiciary. It is ventured that the clause of the Constitution appealed to was inserted as a safeguard against the dangers that inhere in the democracy, one of which is the destruction of the independence of the judiciary, a result which, it is assumed, will ensue when the judges are subject to be recalled by the people who elect them. Until this ingenious theory was advanced it was quite generally, it might be said universally, believed that the word "republican," as employed in the clause in question, was used by way of contrast to "monarchical."

It was dread of pretensions to kingship which might be set up in some of the States that inspired the provision to which reference has been made, if the testimony of history is of any consequence whatever. It is companion to that part of the last clause of the ninth section of the first article prohibiting Congress from granting any title of nobility, and the corresponding provision of the tenth section, forbidding the States from making any like grant. Referring to those provisions conjointly, Cooley says:

"The purpose of these is to protect a union founded on republican principles and composed entirely of republican members against aristocratic and monarchial innovations." (Cooley on Const. Lim., 28, 6th ed.)

Whatever persuasiveness there might be in the line of alleged reasoning at which the conclusion is reached that the systems adverted to affect a State government with a fatal antirepublican character must appertain to the initiative and referendum, not to the recall. The former secures what has been appropriately called direct legislation by the enactment of a law in the one case and its nullification in the other. Therein lies the vice, as it is claimed, of the system, the essential characteristic of a government republican in form being, it is said, that its laws are made by delegates or representatives of the people, not by the people themselves, except as they are so represented. The recall, on the contrary, has no reference to direct legislation. It has its field only in the case of representatives chosen to make the laws, to construe them, or to administer them. It can operate only in a government which is republican in form. It is coupled in the public mind with the initiative and referendum only because it is the purpose of both systems to secure a higher degree of faithfulness on the part of the legislative representatives.

By the former the people undo what their representatives have done amiss, as they believe, or enact such measures as they have been remiss in omitting to sanction. The primary purpose is not to supplant but to supplement the representative system, that it may be more truly representative. The incentive to procure legislation by corrupt measures is largely withdrawn, it is argued, when the product must run the gantlet of popular approbation to which it may be subjected by the referendum. Indifference to the demands of the people in the matter of legislation, often enforced by platform pledges, will vanish, it is contended, when the certainty confronts the legislator that they will be secured, anyway, through the initiative. By the recall he is displaced with a view to obviating the necessity of a resort to the initiative or referendum or as a penalty for compelling it.

However, then, the system of direct legislation may encroach upon the essential character of a republican form of government, the recall is not amenable at all to the strictures of its critics in that direction. It is sufficient to say, in passing, that the Supreme Court of Oregon in an opinion written by Judge Bean, since appointed United States district judge, in which all of his associates concurred, has held that the argument is unsound and untenable even as addressed to the initiative and referendum. (Kidderly v. City of Portland, 74 Pac., 710.) It would be surprising if any court did reach any other conclusion in view of the prevalence of the town-meeting system throughout New England at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, a feature of the State government which, still persisting, has been extolled as "the wisest invention ever devised by the work of man for the perfect exercise of self-government and for its preservation."

It apparently did not occur to the fathers of the Constitution that those States in which the people were permitted to legislate directly in respect to certain affairs, where the method of a pure democracy constituted a part of their system of government, were, by reason of that fact, ineligible to membership in the Union. They were all admitted, yea, invited to come in, with such local governments as prevailed among them. By the very act of admitting their Representatives in Congress that body determined that such existing governments were republican in form; and so with respect to the systems devised by the people of the new States as they were severally taken into the Union. In Luther v. Borden (7 How., 1) the Supreme Court of the United States said:

"When the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority."

The extreme to which the people of a State may go in forming a scheme of local government without transgressing against that provision of the National Constitution which admonishes them that it must be republican in form may be gathered from the fact, a circumstance involved in the case last above referred to, that Rhode Island, unlike the others of the original States, adopted no new constitution pursuant to the recommendation of Congress upon the adoption of the Declaration of Independence, but proceeded under the charter granted by Charles the Second in 1663 with only such changes as were necessary to adapt it to their condition and rights as an independent State. It took a rebellion to change the antiquated system which was recognized for over half a century, whatever its vices and weaknesses may have been, as at least republican in form. It will be impossible to condemn any State constitution as antirepublican if a parallel can be found for the supposed obnoxious feature in the constitution of any one of the 13 original States as it existed at the time the Federal Government came into existence. So the United States Supreme Court said in Minor v. Happersett (21 Wall., 162), using the following language:

"No particular government is designated as republican; neither is the exact form to be guaranteed in any manner especially designated. The guaranty necessarily implies a duty on the part of the States themselves to provide such government. All the States had governments when the Constitution was adopted. In all the people participated to some extent through their representatives elected in the manner especially provided. These governments the Constitution did not change. They were accepted precisely as they were, and it is therefore to be presumed that they were such as it was the duty of the States to provide. Thus we have unmistakable evidence of what was republican in form within the meaning of that term as employed in the Constitution."

Let this test be applied to the recall as it affects the judicial office. At the time the Constitution was adopted, in no instance was either the governor or any of the judges elected by the people. The latter were uniformly either appointed by the governor or elected by the legislature. In New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and South Carolina they could be removed by address of that body, a majority vote sufficing in Rhode Island and Pennsylvania. Bear in mind, by address—not by impeachment. While impeachment proceedings contemplate definite charges and a trial, neither the one nor the other is requisite in the case of removal by address. A simple vote ends the official career of the individual against whom it is successfully leveled. This method of terminating the official life of the incumbent of a judicial office was borrowed from the English system, under which, since the revolution of 1688, judges have been and still are removable by a majority vote of each House of Parliament. In Rhode Island the tenure was even more precarious, a majority of all the members in joint committee sufficing to accomplish the retirement of a judge. The constitution of that State, adopted in 1842, superseding the old colonial charter, provided that—

"Each judge shall hold his office until his place be declared vacant by a resolution of the general assembly to that effect."

The ancient patent under which the colony was originally governed gave to the inhabitants "the power to place or displace officers of justice as they or the greater part of them shall by free consent agree to."

Confessedly, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island came into the Union enjoying a "republican form of government." So that to maintain that a constitution embodying the recall applicable to the judicial office is antirepublican we are driven to the conclusion that a State under whose fundamental law judges are elected by a majority vote of the legislature and are removable by a majority vote of the legislature is republican in form, while that State whose judges are elected by the vote of the people and who are removable by a majority vote of the people is not. That phase of the question may be dismissed. The question is exclusively one of political expediency.

As suggested before, it has never been seriously contemplated to make the recall applicable solely to judges, as might be gathered from some of the discussions in which the question has been involved. The inquiry presents the advisability of a general recall system and then an exception of judges from its operation. A very brief reference to the subject in its general aspect must suffice here. As to all purely administrative offices the question is not perhaps very important. It must be admitted that as to all such the system is ideal except in the contemplation of those who regard the people as fickle, vascillating, "unstable as water," and likely to embroil themselves in constantly recurring elections by continued resort to this method of relief from fancied grievances. Such an argument might be quite forcible as applied to the people of San Domingo, Venezuela or Guatemala, but it is a reform to the adoption of which the people of the United States are invited—not those of Latin America, not a race of turbulent fanatics like those that crowded the court of Herod, nor a primitive people like those that made "unstable Athens heave her noisy seas."

It is exceedingly difficult to understand why it is good business policy in every great corporation to retain, when it can, the right to dismiss its secretary, auditor, or treasurer at will, but is impolitic for the people to retain the right to dismiss a county clerk or a State treasurer when they see fit to do so. A business man or corporation is sometimes forced to enter into a long-time contract in order to secure or retain the services of a valued servant, but it is avoided, for obvious reasons, whenever unnecessary. Usually such contracts bind both parties. The public servant, performing similar services, has his employer bound, but he may escape the obligations of his services at any time by resigning. As to the legislative office, it affords such a check upon a career of corruption, regrettably not infrequent, particularly in municipal councils, as ought to commend it generally with respect to such. In respect to such offices, a course of conduct extending over a considerable period of time may bring conviction of guilt to all intelligent observers that can not be resisted, and yet evidence sufficient to expel be entirely unavailable.

And why should a Member who has violated the pledges under which he was elected, repudiates the measures to secure the passage of which he was delegated, and outrages by his votes the convictions of his constituents on great public questions, continue, against their will, as their alleged representative? In a neighboring State a member was lately elected to the higher branch of the legislature for a term of four years at an election at which the choice of a United States Senator was the paramount, not to say absorbing, question before the voters. He was returned largely because of his professions of allegiance to the popular candidate for that office, to whose cause he publicly and privately declared himself devoted. He voted for the local favorite for 10 days or thereabouts, and then deserted to become the leader of the forces of his antagonist, a man of great wealth, who had the support of a giant corporation believed to be the master of the political destinies of the State, for whose legislative program the recreant member votes with striking consistence. He was overwhelmed with remonstrances from his constituents, and though they did not affect his course he confided to some of his friends that he was opposed to the recall because if it prevailed he would be one of its first victims.

If it should be regarded as wise to punish the error of judgment on the part of the people of his county in electing him by denying to them the right of recall, why should the interests of the rest of the people of the State be imperiled by his retention?

What ground is there for making any distinction in reference to those public servants upon whom devolve the judicial function? The expression "public servants" is used advisedly in connection with judges upon the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States, which said, in Luther v. Borden:

"Judges * * * must enforce such (constitution) as the people themselves, whose judicial servants they are, have been pleased to put into operation."

It is the theory of our Government that the whole body of sovereign people, as though they were one sovereign, desire that justice should be administered and lawlessness punished. They employ and depute judges to perform the work for them. It is a speculation quite in keeping with the sacred character of the judicial office that regards the occupant of it, in a special manner, as the minister of divine justice, dispensing to each, with such feeble light as finite intelligence and judgment may, such measure as may be his due.

If we were to conceive his appointment to come from the Infinite Wisdom, we must likewise conceive that the recall awaits his first lapse from rectitude. An error in judgment would be overlooked, not attributable to sloth or persistence in vices that cloud the reason. The decay of the faculties from advancing age or illness would call it into immediate action. The upright judge would have no occasion to fear its exercise until it would be merciful to employ it. Theoretically it is ideal, particularly in the case of judicial officers, if we assume that the majority of the people have the intelligence and virtue to use it aright. At the time the experiment in self-government was first tried on this continent they were not considered as possessing either in sufficient degree to make a wise choice of judges possible or likely by popular vote, and accordingly, as stated, in not one of the 13 original States at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution were judges elected by the people.

Now, in 34 of the 40 States the judges are chosen by popular election. These include Georgia, which went to the elective system in 1798, the imperial State of New York, which followed in 1846, and North Carolina, which adopted the popular method recently. The overwhelming sentiment of the people of the United States is that the people of the States, respectively, are competent to choose their judges, and the experience of a century has fully justified that confidence. Irving Browne, in a review of the New York Court of Appeals, published in the Green Bag in 1890, said:

"I have given the names of more than 100 judges, with particulars of many of them; nearly all of whom were first nominated by the people. I believe that under a system of appointment by the governor this test would not have been equaled in merit and distinction, and I point to it as a standing refutation of the argument that the people are not fit to name their judges."

The Federal system of appointment for life, as distinguished from the State system of election for limited terms, is commended in many quarters as immeasurably superior. However, it may be in other parts of the country, it is observed that in our section, at least, the Federal judges are selected very largely from those whose talents were discerned by the people, and who had by them been elected to high judicial position. Vandevanter in Wyoming; Field, Sawyer, Ross, and De Haven in California; Bean and Wolverton in Oregon; Hawley in Nevada; Hunt in Montana; and Rudkin in Washington are of this class. There is not an argument that has ever been advanced against the recall of judges that is not equally forcible when applied to the election of judges by the people in the first instance.

The main contention, about which the argument invariably proceeds, is that the recall would rob or tend to rob the judge of his independence, impelling him constantly, in his official acts, to court the favor of the people by consulting their hopes concerning litigation before him and conforming his judgments to the desires of the majority. That is exactly the line of argument that has been vainly pursued for over a century to stem the tide of democracy as it involves the judicial office. Leonard Jones, in the course of some comments in the American Law Review in disparagement of the idea expressed by Mr. Browne, above quoted, said:

"The worst thing, however, about the elective system is not the fact that it affords unworthy men the chance to obtain judicial office by purchase or other corrupt practices, but that it necessarily, to a greater or less extent, destroys the independence of the judges.

"What chance is there that a judge who is shortly to seek a reelection by the people will uphold the law and justice in a case where the popular clamor is against law and justice?

"What chance, indeed, unless he be a man and not a caitiff. With that kind of a judge the argument has added force as it is directed against the elective system, because that kind of a judge is likely to solace himself with the reflection that so far as the recall is concerned it may not be invoked against him anyway, while if his term is expiring and he seeks reelection, he is up against it to a certainty. Moral courage is a quality cardinal in character in a judge. He is called upon to exercise it in the daily discharge of his duties. He is fortunate, indeed, if he is not obliged repeatedly, in his official career, to brave the enmity of powerful interests whose activity is more to be feared than an outburst of passion upon the part of a community or State against an upright public official who faithfully discharges his duty as he sees it."

Even a Federal judge, unless he be free from every honorable ambition, or has reached the topmost round, is not exempt from these trials, as the testimony of Judge Purdy before the Sugar Trust investigation committee would seem to indicate.

It would be futile to attempt to devise a system that would sustain the spineless creature Mr. Jones assumes, very mistakenly, every judge to be. His pusillanimity is inveterate, and it would be wiser to trust to the people's finding him out. Pilate got his place by appointment and was in no way dependent upon the suffrages of the Jews to keep it. The desirability of independence in the judiciary all will concede, and obviously no unnecessary test, in addition to those inherent in the office, ought to confront the judge, lest there be found those whose moral stamina, sufficiently vigorous under other conditions, should be found unequal to it. I am constrained to believe that in respect to litigated controversies in which the people at large take a decided interest, particularly those which give rise to or excite a class feeling, or are believed to have a political aspect, the evil is more likely to be that the side whose expectations are disappointed will assign the candidacy of the judge for reelection in explanation of the result, if he is a candidate, rather than that the outcome is likely to be influenced by any such consideration.

If the contest is between some wealthy and powerful litigants on the one side and some one supposed to represent or whose cause evokes the sympathy of the so-called laboring class on the other, the unfortunate judge assumes the risk of encountering the accusation of the hasty and unthinking among the multitude that he is owned by the "interests" and looks to them to renominate or reelect him, or, on the other hand, that he is a truckling demagogue, bidding for the votes of the mob. As a general rule, subject to very rare exceptions, the general body of the people harbor no such sentiment and listen incredulously to the imputations made as the vaporings of an unsuccessful suitor. But let any such conviction obtain general lodgment in the minds of men, and a situation arises that is not only to be deplored, but which calls for action, for at the very foundation of orderly government must be found the highest confidence in the administration of justice in the courts. Undermine that and the whole edifice of representative government totters, and there remains no alternative but resort to a government of force.

Herein lies, in my judgment, the weakness of the Federal judiciary. The judge is believed to be utterly independent of the people. He does not owe his appointment to them, nor does he look to them for advancement. No reason can ordinarily be conceived why he should incline his judgment to their supposed will in any case, and he is accordingly exempt from any suspicion in that direction. If he decides a case in such a way as to meet popular approval, the incident is regarded as the natural result of the equities of the case, and so speedily forgotten. But when the case turns in the other direction, the opportunity to attribute to sinister influences its outcome is by no means wanting. Setting aside the idea of corruption in its greater form or in its milder manifestations, as disclosed in the Swayne impeachment proceedings, it would be idle to attempt to disabuse the public mind, in this day, of the notion that the great interests, insidiously perhaps, but none the less effectively, exercise a potent influence in the selection of Federal judges.

While this belief prevails, a suspicion affecting his predilection is easily engendered by a course of decisions, whether right or wrong, by a Federal judge favoring such interests. The social aspect is not an unimportant one. By the methods of his selection and the character of his duties he is apart from the general mass of men who naturally assign as his associates and confidants the more opulent and influential, whose prejudices he imbibes and whose views he the more readily adopts. These are some of the considerations which have given rise to the belief prevalent in some quarters that the Federal courts are a haven for the big corporations that are more or less inclined to rapacity.

The Federal system certainly serves, in the very highest degree possible, the independence of the judges—that is, it makes them independent of the people. The system can not be regarded as perfect, however, if the national courts fail to win and maintain the confidence of the great mass of citizens—unless the people feel that those courts are theirs, the judges thereof their judges, doing their work. One distinguishing merit of the recall as applied to judges is that it operates to permit the restoration of public confidence in the court presided over by a judge against whom it was invoked. Why should a judge, guilty of continual intoxication, for instance, be permitted to continue in office, passing upon grave questions affecting the lives, liberties, and fortunes of citizens, until his term expires or he is removed by the slow and uncertain process of impeachment? A day is too long for him to sit bringing to the duties before him a mind inert or befuddled from drink.

The supreme court of my State granted a new trial in Finlen v. Heinze (28 Mont., 548), because the undisputed evidence showed that the judge who tried the case, while hearing it, being more or less steeped in liquor, trafficked through a lewd adventuress with one of the parties to the action. Some chapters from the recent judicial history of this State might serve as well to illustrate the utility of a system through which could be secured the prompt elimination of a judge whose conduct was such as to excite deserved public reprobation. Had not the erring justice who fled before the wrath of this association, kindled at the disclosure of his intrusting to counsel for one of the parties in a suit before him, a corporation of great wealth, the preparation of the opinion of the court, voluntarily relinquished his seat, the people of Washington would have had abundant cause to be thankful had they been able to retire him under a recall.

Independence in the judiciary is undoubtedly a quality much to be desired. But we may pay too high a price to secure it. Undoubtedly we do when we keep on the bench the obviously unworthy and unfit judge lest that class, small, as I insist, at best, in whom fear of their political future is the ruling passion might be swerved from the path of right. Independence is not a characteristic essential alone in the judicial servant of the people, as might be imagined from the discussion of the subject before us. All public officers are required to exercise it in varying degree in the proper discharge of their duties. The governor of the State, the President, is supposed to be equally deaf to what is called "popular clamor." They enforce the law against rich and poor alike, high and low. It was this quality which endeared Andrew Jackson to the American people and gave to Theodore Roosevelt a popularity perhaps no less widespread. A prosecuting attorney will find daily exercise for the same virtue. It made Folk and Hughes national characters.

And yet I can not think of an officer against whom the recall might be more appropriately invoked than a recreant prosecutor who pursues the outcast and winks at the crimes of the high and mighty. He might, of course, be deterred by selfish political motives from proceeding against lawless strikers who shed innocent blood or wreck property, but I should rather fear his being appalled by some franchise-grabbing plunderbund or domineering industrial corporation that finds gain in operating in violation of law. The youth of this State are being taught by Prof. Smith, holding the chair of political science in its rising university, that the "independence of public officials which our forefathers were so anxious to secure has been found to be a fruitful source of corruption." "A realization of this fact," he says, "has been responsible for the introduction of the recall system under which the people enforce official responsibility through their power to remove by a vote of lack of confidence."

Our political forefathers were wise men, patriotic men. Amidst the wreck of the old order, involving social relations as well as political institutions, they studied to excellent purpose the history of government and the contributions to literature of those who had examined into its philosophy. They confessed their first attempt at organizing a national system a failure. The various State constitutions they hurriedly threw together, as a rule, speedily gave place to more carefully planned and consistent systems. A review of these early charters would reveal not a few notions concerning the proper province of government now universally discarded, some of them abhorrent to the general sense of our age.

But one thing among many in the science of government which they did learn and know is that all power is liable to be abused and that there is a fatal tendency in most men in whom it is invested to use it tyrannically. They recognized that there was reposed in judges a vast power and that in the nature of things it must be exercised without fear of personal responsibility, as in the case of administrative or executive officers who were required to answer for any abuse of the power with which they might be charged. They had in mind the career of Jeffreys and the provisions made by the English people in the act of settlement against the recurrence of such a type on the bench, whereby judges were removable by the vote of the Lords and Commons.

Accordingly, in the case of 9 of the 13 States, as their government was administered at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, judges were made removable by address, special provision being made for the case of that class of officials, usually in addition to a general provision for the impeachment of all offices. As a general rule, a two-thirds vote was necessary, but in Rhode Island and Pennsylvania a majority, as heretofore stated, sufficed. The two methods of removal were provided because impeachment was available only in the case of a culpable violation of law. High crimes and misdemeanors only warrant impeachment under the Federal Constitution. Besides, impeachment implies a formal accusation, a trial, and proof.

The evidence may be hard to get, the offense not grave enough to be a crime and yet serious enough to condemn a judge at the bar of intelligent public opinion. It is a trite saying that a virtuous, law-abiding man does not become a criminal in a day—that character is a growth and the loss of it a decay.

As Wendell Phillips put it, "A man may be unfit to be a judge long before he is fit for the State prison." Thereby hangs an interesting tale. Massachusetts had from the beginning the dual method of removing judges, by impeachment and by address. It was in the very heat of the abolition movement that one Edward Greely Loring held, at Boston, at one and the same time, the office of probate judge, under the authority of the State, and the office of United States commissioner. By virtue of the last-named office, acting under the provisions of the fugitive-slave law, he had been instrumental in returning to his owner a runaway slave, the attending circumstances being exasperating to the people. A monster petition was presented to the legislature to remove him.

The great orator spoke for the petitioners and demonstrated to a certainty that the legislature had the power to remove Judge Loring, though he had committed no crime, without hearing any testimony and without giving him any notice of the proceedings. He made clear how tenaciously the people of Massachusetts had clung to the power to which he appealed since the Revolution. He told of the effort to amend the provision of their constitution in question in the famous constitutional convention of 1820, among the members of which were Justice Story, Chief Justice Shaw, Daniel Webster, and many other brilliant men. A majority of the members of the legislature elected sufficing to remove a judge under the constitution, it was proposed by a committee, of which Judge Story was chairman, to increase the number of votes requisite to two-thirds, the report insisting that the existing provision tended to impair the independence of the judges.

Webster asserted that proceeding without notice was against natural right. The subject was debated with profound ability by many of the great lawyers present, but none disputed the unlimited power of the legislature, or offered a suggestion that the feature in question be expunged. The convention voted down the amendment, but submitted to the people an amendment providing for notice, which they rejected. And so this provision of the constitution of 1780 remains unchanged to this day. It reads as follows:

"All judicial officers duly appointed, commissioned, and sworn shall hold their offices during good behavior, excepting such concerning whom there is a different provision made in the constitution; provided, nevertheless, the governor, with consent of the council, may remove them upon the address of both houses of the legislature."

Notwithstanding the requirement of participation of the governor and council in the formal act of removal, both Story and Shaw declared that judges in Massachusetts held their offices at the will of the majority of the legislature, and so it appeared in Loring's case. For the legislature, having voted the address for his removal, and the governor neglecting to act, another governor was promptly chosen who did remove him.

The considerations actuating the people of Massachusetts in incorporating this provision in their constitution for the summary removal of judges have been regarded as persuasive by those of 15 other States, namely, North Dakota, South Dakota, California, Kansas, Mississippi, North Carolina, Nevada, Ohio, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Virginia, Washington, Wisconsin, West Virginia, Utah, and Illinois, though in most a two-thirds vote is necessary and notice to the judge attacked is essential. In New York judges are removable on recommendation of the governor by vote of two-thirds of the senate.

The conviction seems to be quite general that the people should have some means other than impeachment to rid themselves of an unfit judge. The futility of resort to that method was demonstrated years ago. It has never been resorted to in England since the failure of the Hastings trial. Political considerations are likely to be paramount or, at least, are apt to exercise a decided influence in the deliberations of legislative bodies. The members are not required to be trained lawyers nor judges skilled in the analysis of evidence. An abortive effort was made to impeach the Montana judge, whose evil reputation is perpetuated after his death by the report of the case above referred to.

In 1902, Judge Samuel Chase, an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, was tried by the Senate and acquitted, though Schouler says:

"He had made himself odious by his harsh behavior and irascible, overbearing manners. He went rampant on his spring assize, trying the important offenses committed within his circuit more like a frocked politician who seeks revenge than the minister of law and justice. He ranted before the grand juries as though in a mass meeting."

The heated political atmosphere, the clumsiness of the management of the case, and the patriotic public services of the accused are assigned as reasons for the result. In the Swayne case the defendant admitted that a railroad being in the hands of a receiver appointed by his court, he traveled, without expense to himself, in a private car belonging to the company, from the State of Delaware to Florida and from there to the Pacific coast and return, the connecting lines generously handling the car gratuitously. Yet he was acquitted.

The wisdom of some provision for the removal of judges other than by impeachment being conceded, the question arises, Where shall it be lodged; with the people direct or with the legislature? Arguing in favor of his resolution to amend the Massachusetts constitution on the occasion mentioned, Justice Story said the judge in that State "does not hold his office by the tenure of good behavior, but at the will of a majority of the legislature, and they are not bound to assign any reason for the exercise of their power. This is the provision of the constitution, and it is only guarded by the good sense of the people."

He had no fear, he added, of the voice of the people when he could get their deliberate voice; but he did fear the legislature.

"A powerful individual who has a cause in court which he is unwilling to trust to an upright judge may, if he have influence enough to excite a momentary prejudice and command a majority of the legislature, obtain his removal."

Prescient man! Out of the profundity of his wisdom and learning he saw as through a glass, darkly, the Illinois Legislature with its "jack pot" a hoary tradition. "I have no fear of the voice of the people." And no other honest and upright judge need fear that voice. It is idle to talk about the judge being called upon to take the hustings to defend his decisions. If he can successfully defend his character and his conduct, his decisions will take care of themselves. The people will not require that he be right in his opinions, but that he be honest and decent in his life.

It might be said that there is more occasion for a recall provision in Massachusetts, where the judges hold during good behavior, than in jurisdictions where the tenure is for a limited time. But the tendency is to protract the terms of judges, particularly of the higher courts. In New York the justices of the court of appeals are elected for 14 years; in Pennsylvania the term for the corresponding office is 21 years; in Montana 6. The shortest of these terms is a long time to tolerate a judge who needs removing. The decrepitude of age may come upon him unexpectedly early in life. Illness may overtake him and even render him unappreciative of his own infirmity. A Massachusetts judge was removed for such a cause. With the recall it is comparatively unimportant how long the term is.

One of the grounds of complaint against the elective system is the brevity, as a rule, of the terms, in consequence of which it is claimed the bench has no attraction to the best talent at the bar. The term could ordinarily be safely lengthened with a recall provision. In Oregon it is proposed to extend the term of members of the legislature to six years, but make them subject to recall at any time. Its most ardent advocates admit that it will be a long time until the recall enters the field of the national organization, but if any State is disposed to try the experiment, it is with confidence asserted that, upon reflection, no reason will appear why judges should be excepted from its operation.

Mr. MYERS. I further ask that the article be printed as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. I object to its being printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made to its being printed as a public document.

Mr. MYERS. Then, I will read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has already been ordered printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. It will go in the RECORD, as I understand.

Mr. MYERS. May I ask the Senator from Utah what his objection is to its being printed as a public document? I do not believe I have cost this Government much in the time I have been here. It is the first article I have ever asked to have printed as a public document. It is short, and the cost will be inconsequential. I do not think I have trespassed much upon the time of the Senate or have cost the Government much.

This is a brief but a very conservative and temperate argument upon a subject which is now the cause of much interest to the people of the United States, and I can hardly understand why the Senator from Utah should object to having it printed as a public document.

Mr. NELSON. I trust the Senator from Utah will waive his objection and allow the article to be printed as a public document. It is not a very large document.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not a question of cost at all, I will say to the Senator from Montana. It is an address delivered by a man who holds no position in the Government. He is not a judge. As I understood the Senator to say, it is a speech delivered upon a subject upon which perhaps thousands have been delivered in the United States. The Joint Committee on Printing of the two Houses and also the Senate Committee on Printing have felt that speeches delivered by private citizens should not be printed as public documents. I realize this address is not long.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is the wrong time for the Senator to object at this late hour in the session. Suppose you make that rule at the next session and let the article go in at this time. Make that rule then; it would be a good rule; and I would agree to it fully.

Mr. MYERS. Whatever the rule may be, I know it has been the custom to have printed at this session of the Senate documents that I think were no more entitled to go to the public than this short document.

Mr. SMOOT. I am fully aware that documents have been printed here at the request of Senators, but I have heard many Senators say that it ought to be stopped, and I am really of the opinion it ought to be.

Mr. OVERMAN. I fully agree with the Senator that it ought to be, but in this case——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Montana yield? Five Senators are on the floor seeking recognition.

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from Utah. I will let him finish what he has to say first, and then I will yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought I had the floor. I thought I was recognized by the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Senator from Montana had the floor. The Senator from Utah interposed an objection.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Montana that I do not want him to think that I have any feeling whatever in this matter.

Mr. MYERS. I am satisfied the Senator has not.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not object because the request is made by the Senator from Montana, and to show him I would not do so I will withdraw my objection to having it printed as a public document, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it is a growing evil and ought to be stopped.

Mr. MYERS. I am very glad the Senator permits the evil to grow a little bit more. I thank him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order asked by the Senator from Montana will be entered. [S. Doc. No. 100.]

If there are no further amendments to be offered to the joint resolution, as in Committee of the Whole, it will be reported to the Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the joint resolution pass? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS]. He, however, advises me that he would vote "yea" if present. I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce that the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON] is paired with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. BURNHAM. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CLAPP. I wish to state that the junior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] is unavoidably absent.

Mr. MYERS. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. If the Senator from Arkansas were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr SMOOT. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is out of the city and has a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 18, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we most fervently pray that there may more and more obtain in the hearts of men the spirit of the Master, who reviled not when He was reviled, who bore with patience and fortitude all the persecutions heaped upon Him by wicked men, and died with the sublime prayer upon His lips, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do"; that love may reign supreme in every home, and brotherly love prevail in all the world; that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS IN THE RECORD.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD some remarks on the publicity bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the publicity bill. Is there objection?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know for what period of time?

Mr. BOOHER. For five days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 13391. An act to increase the cost limit of the public building at Lynchburg, Va.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 13276. An act to provide for the disposal of the present Federal building site at Newark, Ohio, and for the purchase of a new site for such building.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 2958. An act to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected," and extending the same to candidates for nomination and election to the offices of Representative and Senator in the Congress of the United States and limiting the amount of campaign expenses:

H. R. 13277. An act to increase the limit of cost of the public building authorized to be constructed at Gettysburg, Pa.; and fluencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected, and extending the same to candidates for nomination and election to the offices of Representative and Senator in the Congress of the United States, and limiting the amount of campaign expenses;

H. R. 13277. An act to increase the limit of cost of the public building authorized to be constructed at Gettysburg, Pa.; and

H. J. Res. 146. Joint resolution for appointment of a member of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 943) to improve navigation on Black Warrior River, in the State of Alabama, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. NELSON, Mr. BURTON, and Mr. BANKHEAD as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE TARIFF ON WOOL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the veto message of the President on the wool bill, H. R. 11019, and submit the following motion in reference to it, namely, that the House on reconsideration shall agree to pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama calls up the bill H. R. 11019, the wool bill, and the President's message, and moves that on reconsideration the House agree to pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that the Constitution prescribes what the question is, and he is not authorized to make a motion on the subject. The Speaker must state the question as required by the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Illinois, if he will permit, that somebody has to do something in order to get the matter up.

Mr. MANN. Simply to get it up.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have submitted a motion, and I have examined the precedents, and I have noticed that it is usual to move that the House on reconsideration agree to pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is the usual form of the motion.

Mr. MANN. That is the only form in which it can be put. That is what the Constitution says, but it must be put in the form the Constitution says, and does not require a motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] this question: Taking it for granted it is superfluous to make a motion, what harm would it do if a motion is made? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I would not expect anybody on that side to know much about what the Constitution requires. If the gentleman makes the motion in the form that the Constitution requires, I have no objection, but that was not the way the gentleman stated his motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman requested that this bill be taken from the Speaker's table with the President's veto, and announced that he would make the motion that on reconsideration the House pass this bill, notwithstanding the objections of the President of the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the precedents sustain the motion that I made.

The SPEAKER. Of course they do.

Mr. MANN. I have examined the precedents. I thought the gentleman was reading a motion, inasmuch as he had a manuscript in his hand.

The SPEAKER. There is no difference between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] on this question.

Mr. MANN. Not if the motion is stated in the form prescribed in the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 11019. An act to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, before entering upon a discussion of the bill I desire to see if I can arrange the control of time. I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this veto message be allowed for three hours, and that at the end of that time the vote shall be taken and that the time shall be equally divided between the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the debate on this veto message be confined to three hours.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] just as lief fix a specific time for ending the debate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, there are intervening matters. In dividing the time it is very much more convenient to know exactly what time you could divide than to have intervening matters interrupt the time. I ask unanimous consent for three hours' debate on the veto message, and that the time be equally divided between the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that the debate on the veto message be limited to three hours, one half of the time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of advocating the passage of this bill, the veto of the President to the contrary notwithstanding. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The veto power is an inheritance from royalty. It is essentially undemocratic, it is in its essence un-American, and in this case is a bold, flagrant defiance of the public will freshly and strongly expressed by the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The King of England in 200 years has not exercised the right of veto, and if he were to undertake to do it it would be worth his crown, if not his head.

The House of Lords formerly exercised the right of veto over the work of the Commons, the direct representatives of the English people; but the spirit of reform, even in England, has stripped from the House of Lords its right of veto of the will of the people, expressed by their representatives through the Commons. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This House corresponds, in theory at least, to the British House of Commons in public opinion. Here, and here only, the American people speak. They have spoken and the President has denied their demand.

Many States in the American Union have seen the unwisdom of lodging in the hands of one man the right to throttle the will of the elected representatives of the American people, and many States have taken from their governors the right of veto absolutely; and other States, whose constitutions have been made in the last few years, have provided that the same vote—that is, a majority of each House, that originally passed a bill, may pass it again over the veto of the governor.

In this case, what confronts the American people? They trusted the Republicans in 1908. You told them that you would revise the tariff in the interest of the consumer. Your presidential nominee interpreted that to be a revision downward. He convened Congress in extraordinary session, and what was the result? An increase of the tariff burdens, a bold betrayal of your promise to the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Elected upon a promise that their party would revise the tariff downward in the interest of the consumer, the people having trusted them, the Republican Party betrayed that promise made to them. Instead of lowering and lightening their taxes, they raised them and made them more burdensome. Now, party perfidy is to be made more galling; the betrayal of the people is to be made more shameful; after the people have again expressed themselves and changed political parties in this House, in the hope to obtain this relief, the President throws the power of his kingly veto over the pathway of this reform.

The President of the United States did not need any Tariff Board report to enable him to sign the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. He signed it, and afterwards declared that the woolen schedule was "indefensible." This bill vetoed by the President seeks to lower a tax not only gathered by the Woolen Trust, but one gathered by the undertakers' establishments and by the drug stores of the country. [Applause.] And yet your President, the man who said the schedule this bill seeks to lower was "indefensible," vetoes this bill that offers to the shivering poor in the United States of America a reduction of practically 40 per cent on the clothing that they wear, a saving to them of $200,000,000 per annum. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But instead of leaving this money in the pockets of the people, by his veto he makes it continue to flow into the coffers of the Woolen Trust.

Why, Mr. Speaker, the President tells us in his message that he was elected upon a platform which declared in favor of the imposition of such duties as will equal "the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries," and, following that, in his message he declares that he is in favor of a moderate tariff. And yet I submit to the House and to the American people that no Republican platform in all the history of that party went as far in declaring for protective profits, to be filched from the pockets of the American consumer and every other industry in America and piled into the pockets of the favored few, as does that declaration in your own Republican platform of 1908. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This policy of President Taft and the Republican Party would use the power of taxation, which is purely—and was so intended—a governmental function for the administration of the Government in economy and honesty, into a profit-making business for the manufacturers and the Woolen Trust. Every other industry in the United States, the wages of every laboring man, the crop of every farmer, the earnings of every professional man, the toil of all the people, must pay their earnings so as to give a profit to the manufacturer. No solicitude is shown by the Republican platform or President Taft for any other class of people in the United States to the extent of taking the power of taxation to build up their fortunes and to accumulate their profits; but he holds each one of them up with the power of taxation to make rich the favored children of the Republican Party—the trusts and monopolies.

Why should we wait, Mr. Speaker? The President says we should wait for a report of the Tariff Board. When did this Tariff Board get so prominent in our political system? When did it become necessary that the will of the representatives of the American people in this body and in the Senate—483 men—filtered from 90,000,000 people should be set aside and that five men, appointed by the President, should be allowed to determine? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Five men, not elected by the people, who are to compose the Tariff Board, are to take possession of the greatest question that confronts a people in a free government—the question of taxation. Taxation, which is the power to take and which has been truthfully said to be the power to destroy, and which, as we know, under the Republican protective tariff plan has been made the means by which to enrich, must be turned over to these five men who compose President Taft's Tariff Board, and the people are to groan under the burdens until the Tariff Board sees fit to relieve them. The people have no right to elect them; they can not be called to account by the people; they do not fear the people; the favor they seek, the one to whom they are accountable is the President who appointed them.

And who are they, Mr. Speaker? Who are these men that we must abrogate the rights that the Constitution gave us, not only to originate but to pass legislation? They are five men. Who appointed them? President Taft. They draw their salaries by reason of his favor, and he tells us that we must wait until that board reports. The will of the people amounts to nothing. The representatives of the people must go home and wait. You have not sense enough to make a tariff bill. You must wait until five men tell you how to do it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Who are these distinguished men who have all of the wisdom of the country?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. JAMES. Oh, yes. I have 15 minutes; but if the gentleman has a question he wants to get off his mind and can not rest without doing it, go ahead.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. The gentleman says the exercise of the veto power is undemocratic. I want to ask him if Grover Cleveland, a Democratic President, did not exercise it more than any other President we have ever had in this country?

Mr. JAMES. Grover Cleveland never did veto a bill that cheapened clothing to the people of the United States of America. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman please answer my question?

Mr. JAMES. The bill that Grover Cleveland vetoed was a bill that took money out of the Treasury and not one that took the hands of monopoly out of the pockets of the American consumers. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]?

Mr. JAMES. Oh, I will yield to him. I have but 15 minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Did I understand the gentleman from Kentucky to say that the veto was an inheritance from royalty?

Mr. JAMES. I suppose the gentleman did, if he was listening. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER. I was listening. The constitutional convention was presided over by George Washington——

Mr. JAMES. Oh, I do not care to hear any constitutional arguments. [Applause on the Democratic side and manifestations of disapproval on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. JAMES. I say I do not care to hear any constitutional arguments.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. JAMES. If the gentleman will state his question. I do not want the gentleman to take up a law book and try to read it in here and take up all my time.

Mr. COOPER. No; I do not want to do that. I want to ask one question.

Mr. JAMES. All right.

Mr. COOPER. Is the gentleman from Kentucky aware of the fact that Justice Story, at one time a member of the Supreme Court of the United States, is quoted in volume 1 of Wharton's work on the Constitution as saying that in the convention there does not seem to have been much diversity of opinion on the subject of the propriety of giving to the President a negative on the laws, and that it was adopted by eight States to two, and that George Washington was president of that convention?

Mr. JAMES. That does not answer my proposition at all. I said it was an inheritance from royalty. It is an inheritance from royalty, and the gentleman knows it, and the reading of that book does not dispute it, and Judge Story does not deny it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Speaker, I was going to discuss this Tariff Board. I have their names here. One of them is Prof. Henry C. Emery, a professor in a college, who has never given any especial attention to the tariff. Another is Alvin H. Saunders. And who is Mr. Saunders? He is the editor of the Breeders' Gazette. In other words, he has changed his vocation now and has become a breeder of procrastination in dealing with the tariff question. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We can not assume that he knows anything about the tariff question unless his vocation as editor of the Breeders' Gazette would lend color to the assumption that he might know something about it because the tariff does breed monopolies and trusts by the wholesale, which have so thoroughly oppressed the people of the United States for the last 15 years. Another is Mr. Reynolds, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, who knows nothing of the tariff. Another is Mr. Page, a professor in a college in Virginia. He has had no training or experience along the tariff line. The last one is Mr. Howard. I served with him in Congress. He is a delightful gentleman. He is a great lawyer and a great orator, but during all of his service in this House, Mr. Speaker, no friend of his ever asserted that he was an expert upon the tariff or even claimed to give special attention to the tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But now, since appointed on this board by President Taft, he becomes a great expert, together with these other gentlemen. My friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], with 35 years of experience, knows nothing about the tariff question. My friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], with 20 years' experience, is set aside. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] is pushed into the rear; and UNDERWOOD and CLARK and CLAYTON, these men with long service and almost a lifetime of experience with the tariff question, know nothing about the tariff, but you must leave it to Howard, and Emery, and Page, and Reynolds, and the editor of the Breeders' Gazette to tell us what to do about this tariff question. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, some gentlemen say that we are undertaking to put President Taft in a hole. No, Mr. Speaker, the people will attend to that November a year from now. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The people we are undertaking to put in a hole are the owners of the Wool Trust, the Harvester Trust, the Farmers' Implement Trust, the Beef Trust, the Cotton Manufacturers' Trust, and the Steel Trust. The monopolies of this country are the ones we are seeking to put in a hole. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You tell us that by this Tariff Board you are going to take the tariff out of politics. Do you know when you will take the tariff out of politics? I will tell you—when the tariff barons, the trusts, and the monopolies take their hands out of the pockets of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, Mr. Speaker, after the Republican Party had betrayed its promise to reduce the tariff, as they declared they would, the people were heard. They sent a Democratic Congress here, fresh from them, assembled practically sooner than any Congress in many years, and this Congress has written its belief in a tariff bill. It goes to the other side, and there the Republican insurgents become convinced that this tariff is a robbery to too great an extent, and they join with us and send to the President this bill. The President vetoes it, sends it back, and says wait, wait till the clouds roll by, wait until something happens that perhaps never will, and when it does happen, if it ever does, as it will happen from the hands of the men he appointed, we, as the representatives of the American people, have a right to assume that it will happen as he desires it should happen. And yet when you went to make the McKinley bill there was no Tariff Board report necessary; when you went to make the Dingley bill no Tariff Board report was necessary; and when you went to make the Payne-Aldrich bill no Tariff Board report was necessary. When does it become necessary? When the people's representatives are in charge and, keeping faithfully their promise made to the American consumers, want to reduce the burdens of taxation and have a chance to do it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Then the cry is raised, "A Tariff Board report is necessary." The Republicans say to us, "Wait until the board reports; we piled the taxes up on the American people in the McKinley bill, the Dingley bill, in the Payne-Aldrich bill without any Tariff Board report, but when you go to take the burdens off of their backs you must wait for the Tariff Board to report." It is their Tariff Board; President Taft appointed them, and will control their report. Wait for it. In other words, its delay, delay while the robbers continue to pillage and the trusts and monopolies continue to plunder.

President Taft will go down in history as the lone and spectacular figure who ever occupied the presidential chair in all the tide of this Republic's life who planted his ponderous corporosity in the way of remedial legislation for the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He will go down in history as the only President that placed his veto against the will of the American people in their effort to lower the tariff burden. Some of my distinguished friends have said that by next December you will have a report from this Tariff Board, and then that you will proceed to revise the tariff.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. JAMES. Why was it, when you made the Republican platform back yonder in 1908 that you did not suggest that this tariff question should be referred to a board of five men to be appointed by the President? Mr. Speaker, standing in my place here to-day, I appeal for the right of the American people's representatives to pass legislation for them. I appeal from a Tariff Board of five "supposed experts" appointed by the President, to the voice of the direct representatives of the American people, and I say, let us write this bill into law, pass it over President Taft's veto, and establish what Abraham Lincoln said should be, that this is a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people. [Continued applause and cheers on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from New York to use some of his time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I think I would be willing to submit to a vote now. However, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] that the immortal band of heroes who framed that great instrument, the Constitution of our country, the best instrument ever inspired by patriotic men, made a mistake in giving this veto power to the President elected by all of the people. Thomas Jefferson, whom you gentlemen claim to be the father of the Democratic Party, indorsed and favored that great instrument, conferring this power upon the Chief Executive of the American people. In this instance, where the fight means a destruction of the industrial system of our country and hardship and injury to the great army of the American working people, it is indeed fortunate for the American manufacturer and the American wage earner that we have in the White House a man with nerve enough, backbone enough, patriotism enough to block the way of a destructive majority in this House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The only President you have elected since the Civil War was known as the "veto President"—Grover Cleveland. We had no outburst then against this veto power—not until it is intrusted in the hands of a Republican President. What is the duty of President Taft? To live up in good faith to the principles and promises of the platform upon which he rode to victory in the last presidential campaign. That promise was that the Republican Party stood for an investigation showing the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, and a reasonable profit to the manufacturer who had invested his money. You taunt him with being untrue to the interests of the people when he is striving to manfully carry out that commission given to him by a majority of more than two millions and a half of American freemen at the ballot box, and a majority of more than 150 in the electoral college.

He owes a responsibility and a duty to all the people. You came into power on account of a divided Republican Party and on no other account. We will meet you next year with President Taft, the invincible, carrying the Republican protection banner to victory. [Applause on the Republican side.] Who voted for this Tariff Commission? That great and impartial man that you elected Speaker of the House of Representatives. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If we are to have a Democratic President you, Mr. Speaker, are the best equipped man in that party. [Loud and prolonged applause on both sides.]

Mr. Speaker, we have started you on the road to the White House, but Mr. Taft will beat you. [Laughter and applause.] I have seen it in the public print that the gentleman hailing from my native State, the honored chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, is to be placed upon the ticket with our great Speaker. That gentleman gave the Tariff Board his support in this House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why, the country is prosperous, the wage earner is busy, the situation is inviting and encouraging to all classes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. AUSTIN. No great interest in this Republic will suffer by delay in the passage of a tariff bill based upon accurate information obtained by the commission, created jointly by Democratic and Republican votes. No great industry, no American citizen will be harmed or hurt by waiting for an examination of accurate information as to the cost of production here and abroad in the next six months. Are you going to injure the millions invested in capital, reaching millions of homes of wage earners and stockholders in the mad desire for political advantage? There is something in this life above partisanship and politics, and that is patriotism, love of country, and the happiness, prosperity, and contentment of all of our people. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, in the short time that has been allotted to me I can not undertake to answer the argument of my colleague from Kentucky [Mr JAMES], nor have I any desire to occupy your time now for that purpose. The gentleman's speech has been heard often in Kentucky before and it has been as often answered there [applause on the Republican side], and the people of Kentucky will answer it again when this question of protection is submitted to them in the presidential election next year. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman talked about taking money out of the pockets of the people, and I wondered if when he was doing so it occurred to him that the business of this House has, according to common repute here, been practically delayed two or three days to give him the opportunity to come back here and deliver that speech. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. It was worth it.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LANGLEY. I can not yield, because I have not enough time.

Mr. JAMES. I do not blame the gentleman; that is characteristic of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. The only further suggestion I have to make about it is that after listening to the speech I do not think the House was justified in the delay. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Mr. Speaker, I voted against this wool bill, and I shall likewise vote to sustain this splendid veto message of our President. I do not understand—and I say it with malice toward none and charity for all—how any protection Republican can do otherwise. We do not produce as much wool in the tenth Kentucky district as they do in various other sections of the country, but we want to be just to the millions of people employed in this industry. We do not believe there in that selfish tariff policy which would retain the duties on that which we produce and sell and take them off of that which we purchase and consume. We believe rather in an equitable imposition of tariff duties, both upon consumption and production, that each may derive its due share of the benefits and bear its due share of the burdens.

Mr. Speaker, the Republicans of Kentucky believe in protection for protection's sake, and they can not be purchased, either, by a "play to the galleries," as the gentleman from Alabama

[Mr. UNDERWOOD] expresses it. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Speaking of playing to the galleries, while I do not desire to pose as the defender of my distinguished colleague from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], for he is amply able to defend himself, yet ofttimes in the last few days, while sitting here listening to speeches from that side of the House, and particularly to the remarks and retorts of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, I have been tempted to rise in my place and quote to him and those who applauded his remarks the other day the language of our Savior in the Sermon on the Mount:

Cast out first the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote that is in thy brother's eye.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, upon one proposition the Republican side of this House and the country can congratulate themselves, and that is that the issue has been squarely joined as between the Republican and Democratic Parties in the message that came into this House yesterday from the President. [Applause on the Republican side.] We no longer differ upon this side as to what the issue shall be in the next campaign, nor is there any difference upon your side, because yesterday, at the conclusion of the reading of the message, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] took up the gauntlet thrown down by the President, and, encouraged by applause upon your side, clearly indicated the Democratic position by proposing to override the veto message. In that message the President defined Republican doctrine. His adherence to the policy of protection outlined the issue of the next campaign. You pretend to welcome that issue, and in that we gladly join.

One sentence from the President's message provides a text for all I care to say to the House this morning. It is a clear-cut sentence, which may be as interesting to Democrats who differ from us as it is to Republicans who pin their faith to it. Here it is:

The business of the country—

Says the President—

rests on a protective-tariff basis.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Some have wondered during recent months and during recent campaigns whether the old Republican Party was drifting from its moorings, and there have been some who have wondered whether the President of the United States himself was not being misled by such demonstrative statements as the one we have just heard from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. Now we are again in a position to know exactly what the aims and purposes of the Republican Party are. Upon this side of the House most of us have held the belief that the progress of the country depends upon the protective-tariff system. Many of you upon the other side have so believed in your hearts, because you have seen the advantages and wisdom of that system as it affected your own States. Down in your fertile valleys you have come to realize the direct results of protection, though you do not support it here. You profess to oppose it, and yet mills have been reared in your midst and new industries have come to use up your raw material.

In spite of your opposition these industries have come, and in spite of the clamor raised by you as to the alleged burden protection lays upon the people, we are to-day brought to a full understanding of our respective contentions, and the President of the United States, true to the principles of the party that elected him, states his belief that "the business of the country rests upon a protective-tariff basis." [Applause on the Republican side.]

But you have been preaching "the rights of the people" much as they have just been expounded by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], and down in the remote sections some of you have been holding your people together with the old notion that Jefferson and Jackson and Davis are still conducting the affairs of state. But in all these districts there is a gradual shedding of the light; the truth is beginning to obtain a foothold, and the people who sent you here are beginning to realize that if the sons of the South are to share in the progress of the Nation they must not continue to be blind to the political principles which make for progress under the banner of protection.

It can not be that the great masses of the people are blind, that they propose to rise up against the existing order; and yet you have been encouraging this spirit of unrest and a waver of faith in the fixed and progressive institutions of the country. Surely there are more people in the country than the 213,000 in the district of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], and they are not deceived when spelled with a big "P" and a double "e" and a "pul." The people are not confined to any one district, nor are they to be swayed by demagoguery. That they seek broader fields and are looking for greater opportunities is everywhere manifest. The spirit of progress comes up from the rapidly developing State of Florida, and the desire for protection against foreign competition in the products of Florida tends to demonstrate it. Do we not see it when the cry comes up from the State of Texas that they want protection for their products against an unfair competition? Do we not see it when, from along the valleys of North Carolina, there arises a demand from those who have been retarded, but who now, when their ox is being gored by Democratic measures, demand protection—even as it affects their investments, their homes, and their prosperity?

You can not long stand upon the platform that the people are being deceived by protection. You can not long continue to deceive the people. You may have some hope in the unrest that your own arguments incite; you may add to the distrust of public men and public measures by your preachments; but if you are looking to socialism as a remedy for your troubles, I commend you to the convention of that party in Milwaukee a few days ago, where the golden rule was obliterated by the personal desires of the leaders. If you look for a severance of old party ties and seek the single-tax standard, I commend you to that delightful colony at Arden, in my own State, where only a few weeks ago resort was had, not to the golden rule, but to the hand of the law, to enforce order.

You can not long control the American spirit which desires to go onward and upward, nor can you hold in your own section, where you have one great monopoly, cotton, all the business of the Nation. Frame your bills as you may, with a view of taking advantage of your natural products, there are still those beyond who will move forward and insist upon a continuance of that progress which maintains for all the people the standard of living in the United States, and which supports it over unfavorable conditions that exist abroad. There may be those who are content to live within themselves and within their own environment. There may be those who, because of that personal independence of which most Americans boast, will be satisfied to settle back somewhere in the fastnesses of the country, but there still are those who will not be content with seclusion, who will want the factory to come, and will invite the railroad and the inventive genius to bring to the people the advantages of modern civilization.

The policy of the party of protection has been to encourage that sort of development. The policy of the Democratic Party has been to thwart that sort of development. But even the Democratic Party is getting wiser. Put it in power, as you did in 1893, and we find no objection to the veto power such as was raised upon this floor a little while ago; nor do we see any individual desire to let go the good things of life which Democrats, by the favor of the Republican Party, have enjoyed. Put the Democratic Party in power in this House, as was done in the last election, and there is no desire to yield up the advantages of victory, for in every bill thus far presented is shown the Democratic intent—careful, skillful, and with motives well covered—to protect those industries in which the gentlemen and their districts are interested, while elsewhere the lopping-off process has been going on.

Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who rejoice that we have been able to have the issue squarely joined. You upon that side of the House have been misleading the people through such appeals as were made a moment ago by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] into the belief that the destruction of protection would mean some sweet sort of satisfaction and revenge against those who had made the country prosperous. And yet we have observed, as you went along with bill after bill, that you were preparing yourselves against the storm that is to come. I observe the learned gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] standing before me now, smiling at the argument I am making. He has prepared the way for trouble. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute more to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I referred to the learned gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], and I will not relinquish the floor until I have finished my reference to him. He has paved the way for a solution of the difficulty that confronts the Democratic Party, should it continue in power. His party would level the customhouses; it would lop off the duties; it would find a new method of relieving the people from the alleged burden of the tariff. The gentleman from Kentucky is a pioneer in this field. He has given us the first inkling as to what his party proposes to substitute in place of the tariff revenues. His bill to levy a direct tax—a stamp tax—on proprietary articles has made its appearance in the House. The people themselves will be expected to pay when the Democratic Party shall have done its worst. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of the question now before the House I do not believe there is any occasion for an exhibition of temper upon either side; neither do I believe it to be a proper occasion for the delivery of merely political speeches, without reference to the question at issue. The sole question, Mr. Speaker, that we are called upon to determine at this time is whether or not the veto message of the President presents sufficient reasons to cause any Member of this House who voted for this bill when it was sent to the President, to change his vote, and that is the question which I propose to discuss.

And let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I frankly concede that the President is entirely within his rights in sending to this House this veto message. But we, each of us, have a duty to perform—to examine this message of the President and decide for ourselves whether his position is well taken.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish first to call attention to this paragraph in the veto message of the President. He says:

> There is a widespread belief that many rates in the present schedule are too high and are in excess of any needed protection for the woolgrower or manufacturer. I share this belief and have so stated in several public addresses. But I have no sufficient data upon which I can judge how Schedule K ought to be amended or how its rates ought to be reduced in order that the new bill shall furnish the proper measure of protection and no more. Nor have I sources of information which satisfy me that the bill presented to me for signature will accomplish this result.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I insist that the veto of the President never ought to be exercised upon ignorance on his part as to facts, but only upon information [applause on the Democratic side]; upon information, when a bill presented to him for his approval that it is wrong in some particular. Does the President in this message assert or attempt to show that these rates are not protective? Not a line. He simply says he does not know.

Let me say right here that the Constitution of the United States did not impose upon the Executive of this country the duty of framing tariff bills or determining what rates should be imposed. That duty was imposed upon the Congress of the United States, and not upon the Executive; and when Congress has acted, performing its constitutional duty in presenting a bill to the Executive, I submit it ought to receive his approval unless he shows affirmatively or presents some facts tending to show that that bill is wrong in some particular. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. LENROOT. I decline to yield unless my time is extended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield. He has the floor.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, Mr. Speaker, the entire burden of this message is the same argument as was presented upon the floor of this House day after day during the consideration of this bill—to await the action of the Tariff Board—with one exception, and that is the concluding portion of the message, where the President says:

> There is no public exigency requiring the revision of Schedule K in August without adequate information, rather than in December next with such information.

The Executive thereby implying, and in fact expressly stating later on, that this will involve only a wait of 90 days before a revision of Schedule K can be had.

It is possible that the Executive does not know, but every Member of this House knows, that there will not be a revision of Schedule K within the next 90 days unless this bill becomes a law. Every Member of this House knows that when we come back next December for the reconsideration of Schedule K many of the very gentlemen upon this side who are now advocating that we wait for the Tariff Board will debate this bill as long as possible. It will be debated for months before another body, and I venture the prediction now, and I shall refer to it at the next regular session, that many of those who are now advocating waiting for the Tariff Board will themselves repudiate the action of that Tariff Board when it comes in upon this schedule. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, with reference to this Tariff Board, it has assumed great importance very recently in the minds of some gentlemen. I have always believed it very important, and if there was the slightest possibility that the report of this Tariff Board would be acted upon by the other side of the House and in good faith upon this side of the House, and by another body, my position might be different than it is to-day. But we can not be unmindful of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that less than two years ago most of the gentlemen who are now crying for postponement of action because of the Tariff Board were themselves opposed to the creation of a Tariff Board. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And, Mr. Speaker, I wish to quote a line or two from the speech of the President at Winona, which has been republished in the RECORD this morning. At that time he gave his ideas on the importance of the Tariff Board. He said with reference to it:

> I do not intend, unless compelled or directed by Congress, to publish the result of these investigations, but to treat them merely as incidental facts brought out officially from time to time and as they may be ascertained and put of record in the department.

Then these important findings were to be treated as merely incidental facts, and not to be published at all. Did you agree? Did those of you who are now pleading for postponement agree with that position of the Executive then? What has caused the change? Is it entirely in good faith?

Mr. Speaker, again referring to that Winona speech, the President said this with reference to the vetoing of the Payne-Aldrich bill:

> It would have left the question of the revision of the tariff open for further discussion at the next session, which would have suspended the settlement of all our business down to a known basis upon which prosperity could proceed and investments be made.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. LENROOT. Then the President sustained the approval of the Payne-Aldrich bill on the ground that to leave the question open would disturb business. Now, if he would be consistent, unless he knows or has information that this bill is not protective, he ought to sign this bill in order not to disturb the woolen business of this country by further revision at the next session. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I want to say just this: There are some Members on this side of the aisle who I know have been labored with very earnestly in the endeavor to change their votes upon this question; and when this roll is called, those who do change, if there be such, can not, in my opinion, escape being convicted before the country of either being insincere when they voted for this bill when it was sent to the President or else of not daring to express their convictions now for fear of incurring the displeasure of the administration and the losing of Federal patronage. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise.

Mr. JACKSON. To know if the gentleman from Wisconsin has any time to yield.

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from New York to consume some of his time.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman use 10 minutes more on his side?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Very well; I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, prior to the election of 1908 the Republican Party awoke to the fact that there was a widespread demand which could not be longer resisted with safety for a revision of the tariff. The controlling influences in that party resented that disposition upon the part of the people to be relieved, but, nevertheless, realizing the political necessity, they inserted in their platform of that year a promise to revise the tariff, and in connection with that promise they inserted a proposition which is the most absurd economic proposition ever inserted in a political platform—the proposition of laying a tariff based on the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, and laid so as to insure a reasonable profit to American producers. But at an extra session of Congress following that election a tariff bill was passed, and in that bill the controlling influences in the Republican Party showed their resentment against the desire of the people to have a revision, and by the schedules that were passed and the rates that were fixed they undertook to rebuke the folks for asking for a revision. They attempted, Mr. Speaker, to make the folks sorry that they had ever requested relief, because from the beginning to the end the Payne bill was written so as to impose additional burdens.

The bill was signed by the President, but he accompanied his signature with a public apology. The country accepted the bill because it had to, but it declined to accept the apology. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] And so at the election of 1910 our party was commissioned to deal with the tariff question. Shortly following the signature and the apology which the President put forth, he made a speech in a Western State, the famous Winona (Minn.) speech, in which he said:

With respect to the wool schedule, I agree that it is too high and that it ought to have been reduced, and that it probably represents considerably more than the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production here. The difficulty about the woolen schedule is that there were two contending factions early in the history of Republican tariffs, to wit, woolgrowers and the woolen manufacturers, and that finally, many years ago, they settled on a basis by which wool in the grease should have 11 cents a pound, and by which allowance should be made for the shrinkage of the washed wool in the differential upon woolen manufactures. The percentage of duty was very heavy—quite beyond the difference in the cost of production, which was not then regarded as a necessary or proper limitation upon protective duties.

When it came to the question of reducing the duty at this hearing in this tariff bill on wool, Mr. PAYNE, in the House, and Mr. Aldrich, in the Senate, although both favored reduction in the schedule, found that in the Republican Party the interests of the woolgrowers of the far West and the interests of the woolen manufacturers in the East and in other States, reflected through their representatives in Congress, was sufficiently strong to defeat any attempt to change the woolen tariff, and that had it been attempted it would have beaten the bill reported from either committee. I am sorry this is so, and I could wish that it had been otherwise.

It will be remembered that the President did not require the cunning genius of a Tariff Board to reach these conclusions. His native intellectual honesty was then sufficient.

Mr. Speaker, the country took that statement at its full value. The country realized that the interests that had control of the Republican Party in the East and in the West were sufficient to prevent the re-formation of the woolen schedule, and therefore desiring relief on that schedule they turned to a party and a people who were not the representatives of the interests and commissioned them to rewrite the woolen schedule.

The President said:

I am sorry this is so, and I could wish that it had been otherwise.

At the election of 1910 it was made otherwise. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] A woolen bill has been written here not by the representatives in the Republican Party of the East and of the West that were controlled by the woolen interests, but by the representatives of the people, but when it reached the President—well, those interests seemed to have changed not their habits but their base of operations. The interests were so strong through their representatives in Congress as to defeat a modification of the woolen schedule in 1909, according to the President. It seems that the interests are now so strong in the executive chamber as to defeat the woolen schedule that has now been written to give the people relief.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NYE].

Mr. NYE. Mr. Speaker, I fear that neither the temper of the country nor of the House are altogether conducive to a clear, calm, and thoroughly unimpassioned decision on this grave and important question that is now before the House.

A great industrial policy, to be dealt with through legislation and largely through political instrumentalities, is before us. It is unfortunate that such a question, involving all that is nearest and best to the industry and homes of the American people, should of necessity be a party question at all, and I feel that much of the party contention has but retarded us in the exercise of that patriotic judgment which it is our duty to exercise to-day.

For several years agitation throughout the country in the Republican Party upon the subject of tariff led to a sentiment of revision. It is to be regretted that our own party differed and differed quite widely as to what is necessary protection and what is not. I have belonged to that wing of the party which believes that substantial reductions in tariff rates should be secured. In view of that, I did not support, upon its final passage, the Payne tariff bill, and I believed, and do now believe, that this woolen schedule should be revised ably and candidly and honestly and the duties reduced. I voted for the conference report as a protest to what I believed to be duties that were too high and in obedience to what I believed to be the sentiment of my people.

I recognized the fact then or believed it to be my duty to vote for the measure and to hear what the executive branch of the Government had to say upon the question. I have read and reread the message of the Executive with great care and deliberation, and I am convinced that whether it be popular or unpopular it is my duty to my constituency and to the country to yield to the judgment of the President, which he has so clearly expressed. [Applause on the Republican side.] Let me call attention to a sentence or two in the message. After referring to the congressional proceeding by which the bill was finally sent to him he says:

I do not mention these facts to criticize the method of preparation of the bill; but I must needs refer to them to show that the congressional proceedings make available for me no accurate or scientifically acquired information which enables me to determine that the bill supplies the measure of protection promised in the platform on which I was elected.

I am unable to supply that information myself, and have not been. I do not think the country is going to suffer greatly by the delay, and unlike my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], I am not of the opinion that it is impossible for us at the regular session to pass a bill which is better than this in the interest of the people. I believe that when we meet—Republicans and Democrats and the different wings of the different parties, and there are several wings so far as this tariff question is concerned—in the cool days of winter to deliberate upon this great question, we shall be able by the united efforts of the best which is within us all to give to the country a bill more mature and more satisfactory, and in which the people of the country will have greater confidence. [Applause on the Republican side.] If the other side of the House are in favor of this bill, they certainly will be in favor of a bill equally good I should suppose at the next session, and we shall have the advantage of the information which may be furnished by this functionary specially provided by both parties to give us information. I do not expect that information to be infallible, but I expect it will aid us in reaching a result that will be better for the country than the immature and, I say with all respect, ill-considered bill which we have now before us. I call attention again to the closing paragraph of the President's message, in which he says:

There is no public exigency requiring the revision of Schedule K in August without adequate information, rather than in December next with such information. December was the time fixed by both parties in the last Congress for the submission of adequate information upon Schedule K with a view to its amendment. Certainly the public weal is better preserved by delaying 90 days in order to do justice, and make such a reduction as shall be proper, than now blindly to enact a law which may seriously injure the industries involved and the business of the country in general.

Mr. Speaker, I can not resist the wisdom of that statement. I believe that patriotism and the good of the country, the good of the great people of the country, demands that we listen at this hour to his admonition. This session has been full of vanity and vexation of spirit. The temper has not been good. The country may well sift and resolve this question for the next three or four months, and we shall be better able to pass intelligently and patriotically upon the subject. I trust this House, partisan even though it may be, after this long agitation and debate in the country, when we shall gather here in the winter months will be able to give us a bill which, I believe, will meet the honest demands of the country. I feel constrained upon full reflection and upon full consideration of the President's reasons given to adhere to those reasons, and to vote now against the passage of the bill over his veto. [Applause on the Republican side.] I will say further, I am not ready to join in a Democratic rebuke of a Republican President, whose message to the House I feel is a reasonable and just plea for reconsideration, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. NYE] began his remarks there were many of us on this side of the aisle who wondered at the extreme sadness of his manner and the funereal tone in which his voice was pitched.

The gentleman had not proceeded very far with his remarks, however, before we discovered the reason for his sadness, and then, as the gentleman brought plainly to view the magnificent dish of crow he proposed to eat, we no longer wondered.

The gentleman from Minnesota, and doubtless others of his so-called insurgent colleagues, after having supported the wool bill at every stage of the proceedings throughout this long session of Congress now come at the first time when their votes are really needed and desert the bill that they helped to pass in the hour of its supreme trial. That they do so without rhyme or reason is perfectly apparent when we recall that the President does not urge a single reason against the passage of the bill which was not urged with fully as much force as he employs at the time the gentleman from Minnesota and his associates gave their votes for the passage of the bill they now desert.

While I never question the motives of gentlemen on this floor, yet it does seem to me that the only reasonable explanation of this remarkable change of front on the part of these gentlemen is that when they supported the bill their ears were keenly attuned to the cries for relief that have come up everywhere from the consuming public, even from their own districts, and that when they deserted it, as they do to-day, their hearing has become less acute, and they can now hear nothing but the appeals of their party chieftain, the President of the United States. It is apparent that some of the Republican ears that were once keenest to hear the slightest whisper of their constituencies on this subject are now deaf to the loudest shouts from the same source.

So be it. The Republican President of the United States has made this issue. He has denied to the masses of the American people the just relief to which they are entitled and which they so unmistakably demanded of him last November. He has put his will against their interest, his veto against their cry for relief. The Democratic Party desires no better issue. It takes up the President's gauntlet. While sorrowing that it is yet unable to give relief to the people, yet it also rejoices that to-day the shallowness and insincerity of Republican promises for relief from excessive tariff burdens is made manifest before all men and that the idle hope so long cherished by many independent and progressive Republican voters that the Republican Party can be trusted to give relief from these burdens is thoroughly and finally blasted.

Pardon me, Mr. Speaker, if, as briefly as may be, I undertake to restate the issue as joined to-day before this House and the American people.

For years the great majority of the American people have believed that the "protection" afforded by our tariff schedules is excessive and has become grievously burdensome. This belief grew in strength and almost into general acceptance, until by 1908 even the Republican Party that had framed and passed the Dingley bill was forced to yield somewhat to the sentiment thereby engendered. So, in 1908 the Republican Party promised a revision of the tariff. While the promise was made in terms so equivocal that the very language in which it was couched ought to have warned the people of the insincerity of the performance, yet Mr. Taft, the Republican nominee for President, in his letter accepting the nomination, sought to allay this suspicion by the unequivocal statement that the tariff revision promised by his party was revision downward.

In the campaign of 1908 moderate protectionists throughout the country were appealed to by the Republicans to support that party and so intrust the revision and lowering of the tariff to its friends rather than its foes. The Taft letter of acceptance and the many tariff utterances of that gentleman while a candidate induced many doubtful voters to support the Republican Party in the belief that it intended to really reform and lower the tariff duties, and thus lighten the burdens of the American consumer. This vote was large enough to determine the election, and the Republican Party again won.

What happened? It was not long before the shell game that had been played on the people became evident. Taft, the friend of Roosevelt, the inheritor of "my policies," the Van Buren of a latter-day Republican Jackson, was at the very threshold of his administration captured by Aldrich and CANNON, and from a supposedly implacable foe of the "Iron Duke of Illinois" [Mr. CANNON] became his staunchest friend, his most potent ally. The first act of his administration was to call the extraordinary session of 1909. Its net result was the Payne-Aldrich bill, which, so far from giving to the people the reductions promised them in 1908, gave them even a higher rate and more oppressive schedules, in many instances, than the Dingley law itself. On this subject I do not ask the House or the country to take a Democratic, and therefore partisan, view alone, but I refer them to the public speeches of many distinguished Republican Members of both Houses of Congress. In the House, to LENROOT and MADISON and POINDEXTER and NORRIS and many other distinguished and able Republican Members of this body. In the Senate, to Dolliver and CUMMINS, to LA FOLLETTE and Beveridge, and to many other distinguished and able Members of that body. It was a shell game, a confidence game—the American people were promised in 1908, bread; in 1909 a stone was given. Revision downward was Taft's 1908 promise; revision upward was Taft's 1909 performance.

When the Payne bill was on its long, tiresome way to the President in 1909 it was the current rumor in Washington that the President, mindful of his anteelection promises, would veto it; then, that he would allow it to become a law without his signature. Finally it was announced, with much newspaper parade, that the President, having forced certain important "concessions" from the conferees of the Senate and the House, would sign the bill. When he did sign, and careful stock was taken of the "concessions" he had forced, it was found that they were trifling and unimportant and affected the general result about as much as the subtraction of a drop of water would affect the great ocean. Not only did he sign the Payne bill at a time when he knew the passage of that bill over his veto was impossible, but he went much further than giving it merely a reluctant approval. At Boston in the fall of 1909 he gave to Senator Aldrich, who was its Senate sponsor, the accolade of full and complete presidential approval, and at Winona, Minn., on September 17, 1909, he pronounced the Payne-Aldrich bill "the best tariff bill the Republican Party ever passed."

Upon the issue thus made the battle of 1910 was fought. The President met, and justly, the most crushing midadministration defeat that an American President has suffered in many decades. The magnificent Republican majority in this House melted away like snow before a July sun and the long-continued Republican grip on the Senate was loosened and is apparently soon to be broken.

In a panic the President made one desperate attempt to retrieve his failing political fortunes, and believing that a sop thrown to the newspapers of the country might placate them, negotiated his famous reciprocal trade agreement with Canada.

The newspapers and magazines of the country, even those who had been the loudest mouthed in their advocacy of protective prices for the other fellow, were fiercely complaining when they began to find that the protective system was pinching them, and cried aloud for relief from the high prices on paper that the protective tariff system had enabled the Paper Trust to extort from them. Canada, the great supply house of print paper, must be opened to them and the tariff wall torn down so that these "molders of public opinion" might get paper cheaper. An opportunity seemed to present itself to Mr. Taft to recover some of his lost ground, and he seized it. To secure cordial Democratic cooperation in both Houses of Congress in this effort to lower duties generally, including the duties on print paper, between Canada and the United States was not a difficult task. We favor lower tariff duties on all tariff schedules and with all countries. Absolute free trade with Canada has long been a Democratic dream, an American hope.

We were more than willing to help destroy this iniquitous protective system; we were more than willing to help pull the top row of bricks from the tariff wall, and we were glad to cooperate with Mr. Taft in doing so. With his motives we had little concern and less sympathy. It was results we were after. But when we endeavored to extend the relief for which Mr. Taft so loudly clamored in the case of his newspaper friends, who are the chief beneficiaries of Canadian reciprocity, we found our erstwhile ally become our most inveterate and uncompromising foe. When we invite our recent partner to join us in giving to the masses of the American people cheaper blankets, cheaper stockings, cheaper shoes, and cheaper necessities of every kind, we find the gentleman who was so deeply concerned for our newspaper friends most indifferent, nay, most obstinately hostile, and we can account for his change of front on no other hypothesis except that, having, as he supposes, already placated the newspapers and the magazines, he finds it unnecessary to make any further concession to the masses, and fears to offend the protected interests by further revision.

To-day he vetoes wool reductions; to-morrow it will doubtless be the free-list bill, designed to lighten the burdens of our agricultural producers; the next day cotton; then iron and steel, and whatever else we may send him. So much, Mr. Speaker, for the general situation in which we find ourselves. What of the precise issue confronting us to-day—the wool bill, reducing, according to the President's own figures, the duty on raw wool from 47.24 per cent (the Payne rate) to 29 per cent; on cloths, from 97.27 per cent (Payne rate) to 49 per cent; on wearing apparel, from 81.31 per cent (Payne rate) to 49 per cent?

Are these reductions unreasonable? The President dares not say so, though he does intimate that they may possibly be so, but shelters himself behind the timid cry, "I do not know."

From the President's veto message I appeal to the President's Winona speech of September, 1909. Then he said:

> With respect to the wool schedule, I agree that it is too high and that it ought to have been reduced, and that it probably represents considerably more than the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production here. The difficulty about the woolen schedule is that there were two contending factions early in the history of Republican tariffs, to wit, woolgrowers and the woolen manufacturers, and that finally, many years ago, they settled on a basis by which wool in the grease should have 11 cents a pound, and by which allowance should be made for the shrinkage of the washed wool in the differential upon woolen manufactures. The percentage of duty was very heavy—quite beyond the difference in the cost of production, which was not then regarded as a necessary or proper limitation upon protective duties.

Hear him again in the same speech:

But, as I have already said, I am quite willing to admit that allowing the woolen schedule to remain where it is is not a compliance with the terms of the platform as I interpret it and as it is generally understood.

And listen to the excuse he gives for the failure of the Republican Party to redeem in 1909 its pledge in reference to Schedule K:

When it came to the question of reducing the duty at this hearing in this tariff bill on wool, Mr. PAYNE, in the House, and Mr. Aldrich, in the Senate, although both favored reduction in the schedule, found that in the Republican Party the interests of the woolgrowers of the far West and the interests of the woolen manufacturers in the East and in other States, reflected through their representatives in Congress, was sufficiently strong to defeat any attempt to change the woolen tariff, and that, had it been attempted, it would have beaten the bill reported from either committee.

It is a scathing arraignment of his own party in Congress. It falls little short of a declaration that they are not worthy of the trust of the American people and almost amounts to a charge that they have not only betrayed the people of the United States, but their own party as well. And yet to-day, who stands between the American people and this just reduction of the duties on wool and woolen goods? Who denies their righteous demand for cheaper blankets and cheaper clothing? Is it the Congress? The House? Or the Senate? Who, but William H. Taft, President of the United States? And on what excuse? In order that he may obtain light from a Tariff Board!

Would to God, Mr. Speaker, that this same President had been as anxious for "light" when he signed the Payne bill. Would to God, sir, that his great party had been as anxious for "light" before they fastened on this country the enormities and excesses of the McKinley bill, as well. It seems that a Tariff Board is an absolute necessity before a tariff rate can be lowered or a schedule reduced, but it is a useless and superfluous luxury when a rate is to be elevated or a schedule revised skyward.

In the lexicon of American politics, in the light of recent events, a Tariff Board ought to be defined as "A convenient excuse for delaying tariff reduction, but never a good reason for postponing an increase in duty."

The very men who most objected to the creation of the present Tariff Board, with its exceedingly limited powers and jurisdiction, now shout the loudest for a delay until it can report. Why? Because the proposition is to loosen the grip of the tariff beneficiaries on the throat of the consumer, and they favor anything and everything that operates to delay the process.

The utter insufficiency of the President's objections to this bill on this score must be apparent to all, and most of all to those who observed the promptness and alacrity with which he approved the Payne-Aldrich law when he had no Tariff Board at all.

According to the President's public statements the Tariff Board's principal, if not only important, duty is to inquire into the difference in cost of production between this and other countries. It is to make no inquiry whatever into the difference in prices between this and other countries—the most important of all considerations, if this great question is ever to be considered from the standpoint of the consumer as well as from that of the producer, if the man who foots the bills is ever to be remembered.

But even from the standpoint of acquiring information as to the difference in cost of production it is more than probable that the efforts of the board are predestined to failure. On that point let me quote an editorial from the American Economist, the standpat organ of the American Protective Tariff League. As late as January 27, 1911, that paper said:

We are unable to discover any valid reason for the existence of a permanent tariff board or commission. The effort to obtain facts as to production cost has signally failed, and in the nature of things must fail. This fact stands virtually admitted by the most ardent supporters of the tariff-commission scheme. Production cost in our own country is so widely variant as to be of little value, even if it could be accurately ascertained; while the impossibility of either inducing or compelling foreign competitors to disclose the truth as to their production cost is so entirely obvious that any effort in that direction would be time and money wasted.

And yet, upon so obviously an absurd proposition, if this paper is right, the President of the United States ventures to set up his will in opposition to the will of the people of the United States, as expressed through their Representatives in both Houses of Congress.

And what is the nature of the report for which the people and the Congress must wait? It is to be a public report, made to Congress, open to all the people, a full statement of the facts upon which it is based, of the witnesses who state these so-called facts, so that we may judge both of their credibility and of their interest or bias. It would seem that such is not the idea of Mr. Taft, if we may judge from this same Winona speech, for there he said:

Now, there is another provision in the new tariff bill that I regard as of the utmost importance. It is a provision which appropriates $75,000 for the President to employ persons to assist him in the execution of the maximum and minimum tariff clause and in the administration of the tariff law. Under that authority I conceive that the President has the right to appoint a board, as I have appointed it, who shall associate with themselves, and have under their control, a number of experts who shall address themselves, first, to the operation of foreign tariffs upon the exports of the United States, and then to the operation of the United States tariff upon imports and exports. There are provisions in the general tariff procedure for the ascertainment of the cost of production of articles abroad and the cost of production of articles here. I intend to direct the board, in the course of these duties and in carrying them out, in order to assist me in the administration of the law, to make what might be called a glossary of the tariff, or a small encyclopedia of the tariff, or something to be compared to the United States Pharmacopœia with reference to information as to drugs and medicines. I conceive that such a board may very properly, in the course of their duties, take up separately all the items of the tariff, both those on the free list and those which are dutiable, describe what they are, where they are manufactured, what their uses are, the methods of manufacture, the quantity of the manufacture, the cost of production abroad and here, and every other fact with respect to each item which would enable the Executive to understand the operation of the tariff, the value of the article, and the amount of duty imposed, and all those details which the student of every tariff law finds it so difficult to discover. I do not intend, unless compelled or directed by Congress, to publish the result of these investigations, but to treat them merely as incidental facts brought out officially from time to time, and as they may be ascertained and put of record in the department, there to be used when they have all been accumulated and are sufficiently complete to justify Executive recommendation based on them.

And yet to await this character of report, from a board that Congress did not appoint, our legislation is to be held up and the just relief denied to the people, while the President is "informing himself."

Mr. Speaker, it may be that to-day a minority of the Representatives of the people will be able to temporarily check the execution of the mandate of the Nation behind this veto, it may be that for one winter more—possibly two—our people may sleep restlessly without the blankets that are put beyond the reach of their purses by this Executive veto and may shiver on without the warm clothing that they are unable to buy, while the President is "informing himself"; but, sir, it will not be forever—not even for a long time—for unless I mistake the temper of independent American freemen, they are not liable to permit "friends of protection" to "gold-brick" them again. Unless I mistake that temper, I believe the President of the United States will be furnished in November, 1912, with "full information" on this tariff question direct from the American people themselves, without the intervening agency of a Tariff Board, and that he will be given ample and judicial leisure to digest that information, while a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress give the people cheaper food and cheaper clothing and less burdensome taxes.

The issue is made up; we accept it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] use some of his time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know how much time has been used on either side. I have been out and have not kept track of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has 52 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Alabama 43 minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of participating in this debate until I heard my friend, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], scathingly denounce what he called our inheritance from royalty—the veto power of the President. I desire to invite the attention of the gentleman to some comments on the veto power of the President by one of the greatest justices who ever adorned the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States—the justice who, I need not remind the gentleman from Kentucky, wrote the opinion in Martin v. Hunter's Lessees; a great opinion worthy of John Marshall himself, and which established, as every lawyer knows, the constitutionality of that provision of the judiciary act which gives the Supreme Court appellate power over State courts. In his Commentaries on the Constitution, Mr. Justice Story anticipated every argument and suggestion made to-day by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and my friend from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] against the President's veto power.

Mr. Justice Story, referring (vol. 1, 4th ed.) to this power and to the convention which drafted the Constitution, says:

The next clause respects the power of the President to approve and negative laws. In the convention there does not seem to have been much diversity of opinion on the subject of the propriety of giving to the President a negative on the laws. The principal points of discussion seem to have been whether the negative should be absolute or qualified; and if the latter, by what number of each House the bill should subsequently be passed in order to become a law, and whether the negative should in either case be exclusively vested in the President alone or in him jointly with some other department of the Government.

There was in the convention very little diversity of opinion as to the perfect propriety of giving this power in some form to the President. The only discussion was whether the veto should be qualified or absolute.

The proposition of a qualified negative seems to have obtained general but not universal support, having been carried by the vote of eight States against two.

The gentleman from Kentucky denounced the veto power of the English King. But the veto of the English King is not like that of our President. It is an absolute negative. It obtains to-day, although, as Blackstone says, it has not been used since about the year 1700, I believe.

We have not given to our President the absolute veto which the King inherits from his ancestors and which the King has not used for 200 years. The people of the United States by the Constitution conferred upon the President not an absolute but only a qualified veto.

Mr. Justice Story, anticipating this reference by the gentleman from Kentucky to the English King, says:

The whole structure of our Government is so entirely different, and the elements of which it is composed are so dissimilar from that of England that no argument can be drawn from the practice of the latter to assist us in a just arrangement of the executive authority.

Mr. Justice Story declares it to be important to the people that the President possess the power of veto, and he gives his reasons:

In the next place, the power is important as an additional security against the enactment of rash, immature, and improper laws.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

It establishes a salutary check upon the legislative body, calculated to preserve the community against the effects of faction, precipitancy, unconstitutional legislation, and temporary excitements, as well as political hostility.

The gentleman from Kentucky vehemently declared that the man in the White House could not know as much as Congress knows, but that nevertheless he had more power than the Senate and House.

Mr. Justice Story anticipated and answered this argument of the gentleman. Says this great judge:

It may indeed be said that a single man, even though he be President, can not be presumed to possess more wisdom or virtue or experience than what belongs to a number of men. The question is not how much wisdom or virtue or experience is possessed by either branch of the Government, * * * but whether the legislature may not be misled by a love of power, a spirit of faction, a political impulse, or a persuasive influence, local or sectional, which at the same time may not, from the difference in the election and duties of the executive, reach him at all, or not reach him in the same degree. * * * He will have an opportunity soberly to examine the facts and resolutions passed by the legislature, not having partaken of the feelings or combinations which have procured their passage—and thus correct what shall sometimes be wrong from haste and inadvertence as well as design.

[Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Here follows a very forceful statement:

His view of them—

That is, the acts of the legislature—

if not more wise or more elevated will at least be independent and under an entirely different responsibility to the Nation from what belongs to them. He is the representative of the whole Nation in the aggregate; they are the representatives only of distinct parts, and sometimes but little more than sectional or local interests.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Nor is there any solid objection to this qualified power. If it should be objected that it may sometimes prevent the passage of good laws as well as of bad laws, the objection is entitled to but little weight. In the first place, it can never be effectually exercised if two-thirds of both Houses are in favor of the law, and if not it is not so easily demonstrable that the law is either wise or salutary. * * * The injury which may possibly arise from the postponement of a salutary law is far less than from the passage of a mischievous one, or from a redundant or vascillating legislation.

Mr. Speaker, we have been told during this debate that if men who voted for the wool bill shall to-day refuse to vote to override the President's veto they will stultify themselves and be revealed as moral and political cowards. We have more than once to-day witnessed this sort of attempt at political bullying [applause on the Republican side], but I wish it to be distinctly understood that it does not frighten any man worthy to be a Member of the House of Representatives. [Applause on the Republican side.]

A MEMBER. Give it to him! [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Here is a comment of Mr. Justice Story, which is pertinent at this point. As to the veto, he says:

It assumes the character of a mere appeal to the legislature itself, and asks a revision of its own judgment.

Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court of a State or of the United States sometimes reverses its own former judgment, and yet the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and the distinguished Member from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] assert that a Member of this House who voted for the original bill stultifies himself if he refuse now to help override the veto! What species of argument is this? An executive officer at the head of a Government department may reverse a decision after a review of his prior findings; a supreme court may reverse itself; but a Member of the House can not, lest he stultify himself! [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman four minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for four minutes more.

Mr. COOPER. They contend that a Member of the House can not reverse himself——

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. COOPER. I regret that I can not. I have but four minutes.

Says the great jurist and commentator:

The veto assumes the character of a mere appeal to the legislature itself and asks a revision of its own judgment. It is in the nature, then, merely of a rehearing or a reconsideration—and involves nothing to provoke resentment or arouse pride.

Now, listen—

And yet when on this floor have we seen deeper resentment than that displayed by the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. Speaker, I feel it my duty, before closing, to say that I have not read the various passages from these Commentaries with any view to disparaging the arguments of my friends, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], but simply for the purpose of exposing the ignorance of Mr. Justice Story. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, the great justice declares the veto to be fundamentally wise and practically necessary in this Republic. Hamilton, Madison, Benjamin Franklin, George Washington—all the immortals in that wonderful convention—thought it right; and yet this afternoon we are told that for the President to exercise his constitutional prerogative is usurpation, tyranny, deserving of the condemnation of the American people. What becomes of the vetoes of that distinguished Democrat, Grover Cleveland? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MADDEN. What did he say about the Democratic tariff law?

Mr. COOPER. The illustrious Democrat, Grover Cleveland, exercised the veto power far more frequently than has any other President in the history of the Nation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL]. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, by the confession of the authorized leader of the Republican Party of this country that party stands to-day in the attitude of being either downright ignorant relative to an important question of legislation or engaged in the attempt to perpetrate upon the American people a piece of monumental hypocrisy. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In either event that party no longer has any claim upon the confidence or support of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I sat here on yesterday evening and saw the distinguished gentlemen on the other side, who during former years I have been accustomed to hear denounce tariff boards and tariff commissions and to deny their practicability and usefulness; I watched them on yesterday evening, when their distinguished party President sent his message here, in which he not only confessed ignorance on his own part but was seeking thereby to brand them with the label of ignorance and incapacity. Instead of showing resentment or disapproval, those gentlemen pounded on their desks like a blacksmith on his anvil. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On the 29th of last month I submitted some remarks on this floor, in which I undertook to review the pretended and the real attitude of the Republican Party toward a tariff board or commission and tariff revision during past years. In those remarks I cited the utterances of gentlemen like the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, ex-Speaker CANNON, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], ex-Speaker Thomas B. Reed, and a long list of the veteran Republican leaders not only in this House but in the other end of the Capitol, in which on every occasion up until the past two years they informed every gentleman who urged them to support a tariff board that, in their judgment, the Committee on Ways and Means would and should secure its information at first hand.

But, Mr. Speaker, the effect of the President's message is to plead ignorance, to take refuge behind his own constituted board, and at the same time to offer no criticism of the piece of legislation submitted to him for his approval or disapproval. This bill should be promptly passed over his veto. I sat here awhile ago and listened in astonishment to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NYE], who said that he bowed to the judgment of the President. Why, Mr. Speaker, what was the judgment of the President? He had no judgment, except that he was too ignorant to pass on a matter of legislation that has been before every American Congress in the history of the Government and before the American people in every political campaign in the country's history. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And yet the gentleman from Minnesota, while the President was confessing to his own incapacity and lack of intelligence and by indirection branding the gentleman from Minnesota and every other Member of both branches of Congress with lack of intelligence and legislative capacity, he meekly bows to the so-called judgment of the President, as expressed in that message on yesterday afternoon. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I make the point that the operation of this board, which is created under the direction of the President, the officers of the board being under his absolute direction and dictation, places within the power of the President the privilege of fixing both the time and the manner of revising the tariff by Congress. The President appoints the members of the board and fixes their salaries. This House can not and, if the dictum of the President is to be regarded, this House dare not undertake to take up and consider a single one of the remaining 12 schedules of the tariff law until he first makes up his mind as to the time and manner in which he will direct his board to go about selecting such facts as he and they may determine and in their own good time send them over to Congress for its action.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. If it is brief.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Who directed the Tariff Board to investigate the wool schedule?

Mr. HULL. Congress did not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I beg the gentleman's pardon; Congress did.

Mr. HULL. I beg the gentleman's pardon; there has not passed Congress a law that directs that board to do anything, and, I believe, the fact that Congress undertook to direct the board was one of the reasons for the defeat of that bill. But, Mr. Speaker, I will not go into the inside details of the defeat of the Tariff Board measure now.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman allow me right there?

Mr. HULL. I can not, for I have but a few moments. I want to say one other word about the effect of the operation of this board. As I said, it places, not in Congress, but in the hands of the President and takes entirely away from Congress the right and power of naming the time and the manner of revising the tariff and places it exclusively in the hands of the President.

In addition to that, under the present manipulation of this board, it is in effect a reviewing tribunal of the action of the House and the Senate. We have presented here to-day the fact that Congress has passed a bill revising the woolen schedule. The President says this shall first be acted upon by the board before becoming a law. Inferentially and pretendedly, Mr. Speaker, if the board should approve this bill the President will then send a message to Congress next winter recommending that the opinion of the board be acquiesced in by Congress. I say the inevitable effect of the operation of this board is to act as a reviewing tribunal of every act of this House, and of the Senate as well, pertaining to tariff legislation. This entire Tariff Board business is a sham and a device for delay and evasion.

Now, the President has changed his mind very much during the last two years. Three years ago the Republican national convention was urged to insert a Tariff Board or Commission plank in its platform. It declined to do it. The President was consulting the Ways and Means Committee during all the months they were preparing the data preliminary to the drafting of the last tariff law, and during this time and prior he was being importuned by different individuals to urge the creation of a Tariff Board. His attitude then was entirely different from what it has been recently. Then he wanted revision at once and without the aid of a Tariff Board.

A New York paper, the Herald, on February 27, 1909, reports the President, in replying to some of these gentlemen who were urging him to favor a Tariff Board, as follows:

> The one advantage of appointing a commission with power to revise the schedules would be that it would postpone action, thus giving the country time to fully recover from the effects of the recent depression. On the other hand, the existence of such a commission would keep the business community on the tenterhooks all the time and be a perpetual disturbing cause. Better have the matter up before Congress in extra session to settle it, and settle it one way or the other for a term of years. This seems to be the view of Mr. Taft.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it is most fortunate, indeed, that our forefathers, in their wisdom, provided for the interposition of an Executive act to check the course of hasty, ill-advised, undigested, harmful legislation. Let us review for a moment the history of the legislation just vetoed. Prepared without the opportunity being given for a hearing on the part of those interested in the manifold industries affected; hastily presented to the House in an undigested form, with the frank declaration that it was presented without regard to its effect upon the people interested in the industries or as to what the outcome should be touching those industries and the people engaged in them; the bill passed and went to the Senate, and there an entirely different measure, the fruit of a coalition, the constituent parts of which differ as widely in their views on tariff as do the two sides of this Chamber, was substituted for the House bill.

The two measures thus passed upon in the two bodies finally were brought to conference, a conference the majority of which still held the view that the bill should be framed purely with regard to revenue and without regard to the industries of the people affected, the minority of those on the conference holding somewhat to the view of protection, and yet openly charged with more anxiety to present legislation which might be embarrassing to the President than to prepare a carefully drawn, scientific measure which would produce revenue on the one hand and protect the industries of the people on the other. I make no such charge, but I do say that it was clearly utterly impossible for anyone who participated in that conference, believing in the doctrine of protection, to impress his views upon the majority in a manner even remotely satisfactory to him. So that the measure as finally presented to the President for his signature was a measure satisfactory neither to those who believe in a tariff for revenue only nor those who believe in a tariff providing for adequate protection. This was the legislation presented to the President of the United States at a time when within three months we shall have full and complete knowledge of the subjects under discussion through the report of the Tariff Board, and at which time we can prepare a bill based on accurate knowledge. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Because the Democratic majority in the House assume that their majority here indicates that the American people are prepared to repudiate or have repudiated the doctrine of protection, it does not follow that they are correct in that view, and the veto message of the President is a courageous challenge, not only of the erroneous position they have taken, but of the wholly indefensible legislation that they have proposed.

The Democratic House wool bill would have ruined the wool industry on the farms and the ranches of the Nation and would have reproduced the conditions of idleness, woe, and suffering which occurred under the Wilson bill through the closing down of the mills and factories of the Nation.

The bill which the Senate substituted for the House bill through the coalition of Democrats and low-tariff Republicans was in some respects even worse, if possible, than the House bill; it was wholly illogical in its 10 per cent ad valorem on one class of raw wool and its 35 per cent ad valorem on other classes; its protection to the manufacturer was in some cases even less than that given by the House bill, and this would have been as disastrous to the woolgrower as to the manufacturer, for with the closing of the mills the woolgrower would have no home market, and therefore little benefit, if any, from the seeming protection granted him.

In conference a bill was evolved which combined to a certain extent, in a crude and undigested mass, many of the faults of both bills. This could not be otherwise when we take into consideration the well-known views of the conferees. If they had any views in common in regard to the legislation they must have pertained to a desire to embarrass a presidential veto. The President has met the issue courageously and put the case clearly and squarely in his message. The people will understand and approve his action and will not be slow in realizing that other motives than a sincere desire to reenact Schedule K in a manner which will best serve the interests of all the people is behind the insistence on legislation at this time without information, when through the action of Congress, approved by the people, full information is being gathered by the Tariff Board.

This veto of the wool bill is to be followed, as I understand it, by a veto of the crude and wholly indefensible so-called farmers' free-list bill. It is difficult to discuss that measure seriously. Under the pretense of attempting to do something for the benefit of the farmers of the country there has been hurried through Congress a most extraordinary piece of bunco legislation. The farmers of the country, far from being benefited by its provisions, would suffer directly by it more than any other class of our people, and indirectly, through the loss of their markets, in common with all.

We have heard throughout this debate a reiteration of all the shop-worn Democratic appeals for free trade, and, as usual, these utterances have been the frothy sophistries which are based on the assumption that the American people are so simple that they can be led to believe that the flocks and herds of the country can be reduced by hostile legislation, the mills and the factories closed or run on half time, and at the same time the people be employed at good wages and have abundance of means with which to purchase the products of foreign lands and foreign mills and factories.

There are many people of voting age who have not, during their years of discretion, been confronted with the curtailment of income and of opportunity for employment with the want and misery, which are inevitable, when the industries of the country, built up, established, and maintained under a protective system, are paralyzed through legislation, under which their continuation is placed in jeopardy or rendered impossible. If one did not know to the contrary, he might almost believe, to listen to the fervid rhetoric of the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, that the American people had been impoverished and plundered as no other people have ever been under the protective system. Surely they must have a low estimate of the intelligence of the people if they expect them to be largely or permanently misled by their vociferations. The fact is known of all men that whatever may have been, or may now be, the faults and inequalities of our tariff legislation, we have under its operation, as a people, enjoyed a prosperity greater and more widespread, more marked and general than any people in the tide of time, at least until the shadow of Democratic tariff revision came to cast its menace across the face of the land.

We shall, of course, from time to time be called upon to modify tariff rates, to correct any faults which may have occurred in tariff revision, and to adjust schedules to changing conditions, but the people have desired, and the Congress has provided, that this shall be done after full information—secured through the machinery of the Tariff Board—which information, as to some of the schedules, will be had in December. Upon these facts and conditions the President has predicated his vetoes. They will be sustained by the good judgment of the people.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, the creation of a Tariff Commission or Board has been discussed in the country for a little over two years. Within that time, as stated in the message of the President vetoing this bill, 28 Republican platforms have indorsed the creation of a Tariff Commission that is to secure facts upon which tariff legislation is to be enacted. On the 30th day of last January the Ways and Means Committee brought in a unanimous report upon a bill that created such a commission. In response to a popular demand, Democrats, insurgents, regulars, and all alike supported by speech and vote the enactment of that law. It passed this House by a vote of 186 for to 93 against. In supporting the bill the distingnished gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. UNDERWOOD], used the following very sensible language:

> Now, there is no doubt that the sole purpose of this legislation is for a board to be appointed to gather facts, not to reach conclusions, and to lay those facts before this House; not facts that the board wants to lay before this House, but facts that this House shall order the Tariff Board to bring before it. You know, and every Democrat here knows, that one of the greatest difficulties we have had to face is that when the Ways and Means Committee goes into session to ascertain the facts upon which they can write a tariff bill, the only men that are sufficiently interested to come before us and give us the facts are the protected industries of the United States. And yet to-day you would vote to continue that condition, to continue to place us absolutely in the hands of the protected interests of this country for the information on which we are to write a tariff bill, and refuse to give us the board that will be composed of men who, by law, are authorized and directed to investigate under our direction and to ascertain facts on which we can base an honest tariff legislation.
> Now, that is the issue. My friend from Tennessee wants to know why we should want information in reference to a bill written for revenue, and revenue only. Why, my friend, of all the bills that require information the man who is writing a tariff bill for revenue needs information the most.

That was only the 30th day of last January. What a change has come over the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means! Without hearing even the manufacturers of the country interested, without information from any source whatever, without hearing a manufacturer, laborer, consumer, or anyone else, without a public or a private hearing, this bill was brought into the House. The President of the United States was not alone in urging among Republicans that there should be scientific and accurate information before a tariff law should be enacted. I note that the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], after he had described the maturing of the sentiment of the country, and how that sentiment had driven this Congress to action, and had brought from the Ways and Means Committee a unanimous report in favor of the creation of this board, proceeded to say:

> To-day we have the bill before us with a unanimous report from both the Republican and Democratic members of that committee. It is a striking demonstration of the fact that the real sovereign of this country, after all, is public opinion, before whose will even Members of Congress must humbly bow or be retired to private life. This measure is advocated from all parts of the United States. It is not a partisan measure in any sense. No Republican who believes in the declarations of his party is afraid of a tariff commission or board; the name is entirely immaterial.

Then he goes on to say that no Democrat should be afraid of it. What has happened to the gentleman from Wisconsin? What has happened to the wisdom of the report of the Ways and Means Committee? What has happened that made it necessary that we should write this law without information? We have had no reports from the Tariff Board or Commission, and yet we are asked to enact a tariff law upon one of the most important tariff schedules. Why rush this through over the President's veto without a report from the Tariff Commission? Politics, politics, and only politics! [Applause on the Republican side.] If the judgment of the American people is settled upon any one thing regarding tariff legislation more than another, it is that there shall cease to be legislation upon the tariff for purely political purposes [applause on the Republican side] and by partisans without information.

The American people are not clamoring at this time for undigested legislation affecting the welfare of the country. There have been times when we have had such undigested laws enacted without information. You gentlemen passed such a law upon another occasion, so unspeakably bad that your own President would not sign it. He permitted it to become a law without his signature. Your effort at legislating now is no wiser than it was then. [Applause on the Republican side.] You are proceeding upon exactly the same theories that you proceeded upon then; you are using blind partisan political arguments as a basis for tariff legislation rather than information scientifically gathered in enacting a law upon this important subject. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman from Alabama use some of his time now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask as to the division of time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama has 33 minutes remaining and the gentleman from New York 25.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak briefly upon the veto message of the President. Called together by a Republican President in extra session the Democratic Party in this House sought to revise certain schedules of the tariff law and to reduce the tariff taxes. We have had the aid of some able gentlemen on the other side, the best part left of the Republican Party—the so-called insurgents of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The President wanted to pass a bill for reciprocity with Canada. A majority of his own party in this House and in the Senate voted against that reciprocity measure and he had to rely upon the Democrats to pass it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Having been elected upon a platform that repudiated the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, we sought to relieve the people of the burdens imposed upon them by that law. What will you say to the people when they ask you if the Underwood bill as amended by the Senate was not a reduction of the Payne-Aldrich tariff duties? The bill that passed this House cut half in two the duties on wool and woolen goods. The bill that passed the Senate, and which was agreed on here, reduces the tariff duties far below the now universally condemned woolen schedule of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Is not half a loaf better than none? In which direction does this bill lean? Does it lean toward the mountain where sits intrenched the Woolen Trust, or does it lean toward the toiling masses of this country? [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the question that you gentlemen will meet at the polls next year; and let me predict now that the already too patient and long-suffering American people will see to it that the place that knows President Taft officially now will soon know him no more forever. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to yield to my friend from Kentucky, but my time is limited and I can not.

Mr. Speaker, the President says in his message that unless he can protect this protection to wool and woolen goods from foreign competition the sheep will have to go to the shambles. I have heard Republicans here to-day defend sheep; I have heard them plead for the rights and liberties of sheep [laughter], but I have not heard the Republican President or a single Republican in this House plead for the poor and half-clad children of this Republic. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, I imagine that the President as he wrote this veto message, speaking for the Republican Party, said:

> Democrats and insurgents, spare the Woolen Trust,
> Touch not its back or brow;
> In campaign times it sheltered me,
> And I'll protect it now.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, the old Bible doctrine propounded in the days long gone is applicable here to-day—

No man can serve two masters.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

He that is not with Me is against Me—

And I will put it up to the Republicans here to-day, those of you who hope to be able to answer to your names in this House in the next Congress, choose you this day whom you will serve—the Woolen Trust or the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The wise man foreseeth the evil and hideth himself, but the foolish pass on and are punished.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, the time for talking plainly to the American people has arrived. There are two tremendous forces at work in this Republic. One of them is moving rapidly toward a strong centralized Government, with its power centered in one man here in Washington. The other force is moving slowly but with determination toward the perpetuation of a Government whose highest purpose is to secure the happiness and well-being of the American people; to do that which will bring about the greatest good to the greatest number. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, is this any longer a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, when a Republican President can with impunity defy the wishes of the people, ignore their expressed will, and exercise to their detriment and great injury the power that they have placed in his hands? Have we reached that dreaded time when one-man power, closeted in the White House, has come to curse the country? Will the American people fold their arms and sit supinely down at the feet of the Woolen Trust and kiss the White House hand that smites them? No, Mr. Speaker; at the judgment bar of the intelligent, justice-loving voter the President stands convicted of at least carelessness and indifference to the best interest of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The President has said that the woolen schedule is a burden to the people, and that it can not be defended. No Republican has dared recently to defend it in the open, and yet, abused and despised as it is, it possesses such a mysterious charm and fascination for the President that it guides his hand in the exercise of the veto power and saves itself from the fate that he himself said it deserved. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

At the general election in 1910 the American people condemned the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, and sent their Representatives here to repeal that infamous measure. There was one schedule in the Payne-Aldrich tariff law so grim with oppression to the consumer and so bristling with unfair and unreasonable profit to the Woolen Trust that nearly all of the American people demanded that it be revised and the tariff tax reduced. Yes, Mr. Speaker, there was one piece of infamy so colossal in the Payne-Aldrich tariff law that even the Republican President said, "It is indefensible." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States occupies the unenviable and ugly attitude of condemning and indorsing, of being for and against, a schedule that now injuriously affects ninety-odd millions of people. By the stroke of his pen he has kept life and vital power in the most damnable piece of tariff legislation ever placed upon the statute books. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When the President vetoed this woolen bill he renewed the license of the Woolen Trust to continue to rob and plunder the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You can say this for the President—he is loyal to his friends. He is loyal to the interests that stood by him in the campaign of 1908. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The passage of this bill would go a long way toward relieving the consumers of the burdens now imposed upon them by the Woolen Trust. Millions of people would rejoice to see the power of this remorseless monster broken, and I appeal to the Members of this House—the immediate representatives of all the people—to stand up like men and register their will in overturning the veto of the President. [Loud and prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, we are told that the President will, in a few minutes, send in a message vetoing the farmers' free-list bill. In view of that fact I desire to include in my remarks the following report by Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Ways and Means Committee:

[House of Representatives, Report No. 4, Sixty-second Congress, first session.]

TO PLACE ON THE FREE LIST AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS, COTTON BAGGING, COTTON TIES, LEATHER, BOOTS AND SHOES, FENCE WIRE, MEATS, CEREALS, FLOUR, BREAD, TIMBER, LUMBER, SEWING MACHINES, SALT, AND OTHER ARTICLES.

[Report to accompany H. R. 4413.]

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, saddlery and harness, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House without amendment and recommend that the bill do pass.

It was expressly stated in the Democratic platform of 1908 that the belated promises of tariff reform made at that time by the Republican Party were a tardy recognition of the righteousness of the Democratic position on this question, but that the people could not safely intrust the execution of this important work to a party which is so deeply obligated to the highly protected interests as is the Republican Party.

The accuracy and justice of this declaration have been convincingly shown by the Republican performances in the tariff act of 1909, as compared with their promises before the election in 1908. The recent statements by or from the Republican adminstration concerning investigations being made or to be made for ascertaining the real cost of production of domestic and foreign competing articles are to be considered in the light of past experience. Investigations into these same matters have been carried on for years under various Republican administrations, by the Bureau of the Census, the Consular Bureau of the Department of State, and other governmental agencies. Such investigations, although made under better organizations, powers, and opportunities than are found in investigations now being attempted by a new agency of the Executive, have shown, in the results published, no statistical or other data accepted as conclusive concerning comparative foreign and domestic costs of production of protected commodities or affording good reason for the continuance of high protective duties.

CANADIAN RECIPROCITY.

The Canadian reciprocity agreement now before the Congress is a recognition on the part of the administration of the injurious effects of the extreme protective policy which has been so long imposed on the country, and is an effort to mitigate its effects. In the minority report of the Senate Select Committee on Wages and Prices of Commodities, submitted to the Senate June 23, 1910, three causes were given for the advance in food prices, and hence for the increase in the cost of living, as follows: (1) The tariff; (2) trusts, combines, and monopolies; and (3) increased money supply. Referring to these, the committee said:

"We are without sufficient data to apportion the degree of responsibility among these three causes, but that the first two are the chief malefactors we have no doubt, and they are of our own creation."

In his special message first submitting the reciprocity agreement to Congress, January 26, 1911, the President stated in effect that the present welfare of our people and the requirements of our future economic status make the measure urgently necessary. In several public addresses he has admitted that tariff rates are too high, that such rates have resulted in excessively high prices, felt especially in the increased cost of living, which now bears so heavily on the people, and that the people have not received the long-promised benefits of domestic competition under high protective duties. In his address at the National Corn Exposition at Columbus, Ohio, February 10, 1911, the President said:

"I am a Republican, and the Republican Party has always advocated and pursued a policy of protection to American products and manufactures. For a long time the policy had little or no limitation. It was thought that tariffs on protected products could not be too high; that if all foreign products were excluded competition would stimulate production and reduce its cost and its price. The temptation to destroy competition by combinations became so great, however, that the party in its platform modified its policy and imposed the limitation that the tariff should be limited for purposes of protection to the difference between the cost of production in this country and the cost of production abroad, with an allowance for a reasonable profit to the American producer."

HIGH PROTECTION BROKEN DOWN.

This is a confession, as was the Republican platform of 1908, that the theory of high protective duties, as put forth by the Republican Party, has broken down, that combinations and trusts which prey upon the people have been fostered by the tariff, and that under high-tariff protection American manufacturers have forced unreasonable profits from the people. Again, in his address before the joint session of the General Assembly of Illinois at Springfield, February 11, 1911, the President said:

"There was a time when leading Republicans thought that there was no danger in having a tariff higher than necessary to protect any industry. It was thought that if the country was made dependent on manufactures behind the tariff wall the competition between the manufacturers would stimulate the reduction in the cost of production and thus reduce the price.

"But the temptation to combine by which the price could be controlled and thus the excessive tariff taken advantage of, led to a modification of the protection theory and to a declaration that the protection of any industry ought not to exceed in the tariff imposed more than the difference between the cost of production abroad, the cost of production here, and enough to give a fair profit to the domestic producer or manufacturer."

REPUDIATED PROMISE OF DOWNWARD REVISION.

In its platform of 1908 the Republican Party announced the modification of its protection theory referred to by the President, and in deference to aroused public opinion against burdens imposed by the Dingley tariff of 1897, promised a downward revision of the tariff. On this promise the party secured from the people a further continuation of power. How this promise was repudiated in the enactment of the higher tariff act of 1909, and how the people, so far as their power extended at the time, in just resentment have driven the Republican Party from control in Congress, are matters of history. Following this decided rebuke by the people, the President has brought forward the Canadian reciprocity agreement in the effort to remove some of the trade restrictions which he admits are unreasonable. While this agreement marks a desirable beginning of the greatly needed work of revising injurious tariff rates, it is not, nor can it be expected unaided to afford, more than a fragmentary and partial relief to our people. The advantages of the agreement are greater for the people of Canada than for the people of our own country. As the President said in his message of January 26, 1911:

"Reciprocity with Canada must necessarily be chiefly confined in its effect on the cost of living to food and forest products. The question of the cost of clothing as affected by duty on textiles and their raw materials, so much mooted, is not within the scope of an agreement with Canada, because she raises comparatively few wool sheep, and her textile manufactures are unimportant."

REVISION OF RATES ON WORLD'S COMMERCE NEEDED.

Thus in clothing as well as in many other essential commodities, the relief so urgently needed and demanded by our people can not be secured through this reciprocity measure, even with the further concessions for freer trade relations hoped for under section 3 of the bill (H. R. 4412) now before Congress. That the President recognized the advisability of having the agreement provide for a freer trade intercourse is evidenced by the following reported excerpt from his address before the Southern Commercial Congress at Atlanta, Ga., on March 10, 1911:

"When we entered upon the negotiations, I authorized the Secretary of State and his commissioners to offer free trade in everything, but this Canada could not grant us, because she has a protective system and she was afraid of the competition of our better-organized industries."

The relief needed by our people can be secured only by an honest revision of the tariff as related to our general commerce and trade with the civilized world; the plain mandates of the people make such revision the duty of the present Congress. As the President well said in his reciprocity message of January 26, 1911: "Action on the agreement submitted will not interfere with such revision of our own tariff on imports from all countries as Congress may decide to adopt." In fact, action on the Canadian agreement involves the necessity of further and immediate action in removing a number of duties on imports from other countries, in order that justice may be done to the great army of our agricultural producers, who in the Canadian agreement are to have all the alleged protection removed from their products without a corresponding or reciprocal removal of the protective duties most burdensome on the commodities they must purchase as necessary to sustain their lives and industries. As a beginning in the correction of this injustice, against which our farmers properly protest, the bill (H. R. 4413) herewith reported has been framed.

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

By this measure agricultural tools and implements of every kind are placed on the free list, in order to remove or to prevent any possible discrimination against our farmers in the prices of these necessary articles, and to place them on an equal footing with their competitors elsewhere in the world. Our domestic manufactures of agricultural tools, implements, vehicles, and machinery have grown to great proportions and are largely organized into great trusts and combinations. These organizations are selling their products all over the world, meeting and overcoming all competition. They need no protection, and, as a rule, ask for none. For a number of years they sold many of their products in foreign countries at lower prices than at home, and so recently as 1907 agricultural associations in public resolutions protested against this practice. The imports of these agricultural implements are insignificant; the value of all such imports, free and dutiable, in 1910, amounted to $122,302. The exports of these implements have become a matter of more importance than the domestic trade, the figures indicating an increase from $3,859,184 in 1890 to $28,124,033 in 1910. This foreign business will be greatly aided by the removal of duties from lumber, as provided for in this bill.

BAGGING AND BALING MATERIALS.

It is of the greatest importance to our producers of cotton and other agricultural commodities that the materials necessary for bagging, sacking, baling, or otherwise packing these commodities be made free from duty, so that they may be available to the producers at the most favorable prices possible, without shelter for the exaction of unreasonable prices by trusts and combinations of manufacturing interests. The bill, therefore, places all such materials and articles on the free list, including cotton bagging and cotton ties, jute and jute butts, hemp, flax, seg, tow, burlaps, and other materials or fibers suitable for coverings, and bags or sacks made therefrom, together with all hoop or band iron or hoop or band steel for baling any commodity and wire for baling agricultural products. All these coverings and materials for making coverings are essentials in the transportation of agricultural products to their markets. The products can not receive the benefit of any protection in these markets, and for this and other reasons it is unfair and unjust to continue duties on coverings for agricultural produce. These duties have annoyed and burdened farmers and have served principally to increase the profits of exacting trusts and combinations.

It appears that practically all of the jute bagging manufactured in this country is supplied by concerns which are in effect a combination and generally known as the "Bagging Trust." This combination has been supplying about four-fifths of the entire domestic requirements for bagging, chiefly used for covering cotton. The jute or jute butts from which this bagging is made must all be imported, as none is produced in this country. These raw materials have been on the free list for a number of years, and domestic manufacturers have every opportunity to make up and market this bagging at reasonable and competitive prices. Gunny cloth and burlaps, or burlap cloth, are also made almost entirely from jute, and very little, if any, of these cloths are produced in this country. Bags and sacks made from these materials are necessities in the marketing of fertilizers, stock foods, and various agricultural products. The placing of these materials and articles on the free list would be a distinct advantage to the producers and users of fertilizers, cereal products, and other commodities.

It is now generally admitted that even from the protection standpoint no protection whatever is needed by our great corporations and trusts which manufacture hoops, bands, and ties of iron and steel, and wire such as used for baling agricultural products, together with wire strands and rope, wire rods, and barbed wire and other forms of wire used for fencing. By reason of existing high duties our people are dependent for these articles on our giant steel industry, which has captured for its products a large share of the markets of the world. It is a matter of common knowledge that our manufacturers of wire, hoops, ties, and other forms of steel have for years sold, and probably now do sell, their products abroad at much lower prices than to domestic consumers. The high protection they have enjoyed has enabled them to make this unfair discrimination against our own people. The removal of the duties on these iron and steel articles generally and necessarily used by our agricultural producers, as well as by many others, will effect a considerable saving to them, and this, like the provisions of the bill generally, is a long-delayed measure of equity and justice.

On the average cotton crop of about 12,000,000 bales, for practically all of which ties must be used, the additional burden imposed by the duty on these ties amounts to not less than $150,000. This is practically all tribute to the steel industry, as the Government collected only $1,499 in duties on this item in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1910. As binding twine, an important article for packing farm products in many parts of the country, is already on the free list, a like exemption should be given the ties used in baling cotton.

LEATHER, BOOTS, SHOES, HARNESS, AND SADDLERY.

Hides were placed on the free list by the tariff act of 1909 in response to the demand of the manufacturers of leather and boots and shoes, and after a hard struggle with the Beef Trust. The bill herewith reported proposes to place on the free list all forms of leather from cattle hides and cattle skins, together with boots and shoes, harness, saddles, and saddlery. With free hides, as at present, leather can be and apparently is being tanned and marketed in this country at low cost. Leather in its various forms is a prime necessity to all of our people and an essential raw material for many industries. Our manufacturers of boots and shoes have placed their products in the principal markets of the world, notwithstanding the existing duties on leather, which, while not high in comparison with many other duties, add appreciably to prices. The removal of the duties from leather made of cattle hides will be of advantage in the manufacture of harness, saddles, saddlery, boots and shoes, and the free market in all of these articles will necessarily be a benefit to agricultural producers as well as to all the people.

FOOD PRODUCTS.

Practically all that our people eat can be provided by our farmers, but a very large part of it is not and can not be eaten in the form in which it leaves the farm. The meat packing and distributing business of the country is thoroughly organized and is being exploited by a combination of great packing concerns commonly known as the Beef Trust. The existing duties on meats and meat products are for the advantage of this combination only. It is well known that this trust, through the strength of its organization and position in the markets, injures the producers of cattle and other animals used for food by forcing down prices; and also oppresses the consumers of meats and meat products by establishing and maintaining high prices for these articles. Thus the trust controls the market both in buying and selling, and the result is a substantial addition to the cost of living from which all the people suffer. As our population has increased, our exports of foodstuffs and food products have declined and imports increased; under these circumstances duties on these articles have become a heavier burden on the people. In the Canadian reciprocity agreement, cattle and all other live stock, including swine, sheep, and lambs, and likewise wheat, rye, oats, barley, buckwheat, and corn, are placed on the free list. With the removal of duties on imports of these articles from the only country from which real competition could be expected, our farmers are openly and avowedly placed in a free market as to foodstuffs and food products in the forms in which they leave the farm. Representative organizations of the farmers are therefore urging that all the people shall now have the advantage of a free market in buying these foodstuffs and food products in the forms in which they are finally consumed.

COST OF FOOD TO THE AVERAGE FAMILY.

In framing the measure under consideration, for reasons already recited, especial consideration has been given to our agricultural classes and to the masses of our population to whom the necessities of life mean so much.

According to investigations conducted in 1902 by the Bureau of Labor, the expenditures of the average normal family, in the 11,156 families consulted having an income of not less than $600 and under $700, was $611.58, proportioned as follows: Food, 43.48 per cent; clothing, 12.88 per cent; rent, 18.48 per cent; sundries, 19.39 per cent; fuel, 4.65 per cent; and lighting, 1.12 per cent.

The following statistical analysis of the cost of articles of food to the average American family, averaging 5.31 persons, presents forcefully the significance and importance of the food sections of the bill under consideration, as related to the cost of living:

TABLE 1.—Average cost of the various articles of the food consumed in average family of United States.

[Compiled from eighteenth report United States Commissioner of Labor. The statistics are based on returns secured principally in 1901 from 2,567 families of the average size of 5.31 persons.]

Total			326.90	100.00

According to the figures of this table, out of the average annual cost for food of the average family of the 2,567 families consulted for the data, meat amounted to 28.49 per cent and the bread articles 8.93 per cent; meat and bread thus constituted 37.38 per cent of the total annual expenditure for food.

The general public are anxious that no artificial shelter shall be maintained to protect abnormally high prices of food articles in any form. The bill (H. R. 4413) accordingly places on the free list all meats, whether fresh, cured, prepared, or preserved in any manner, including bacon, hams, shoulders, sausage, and sausage meats, and likewise lard, lard compounds, and lard substitutes. The bill also exempts from duty wheat flour, semolina, rye flour, buckwheat flour, corn meal, oatmeal, rolled oats, and all prepared cereal foods, together with biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened, and likewise places on the free list, bran, middlings, and other offals of grain, which are important stock foods.

FOREST PRODUCTS.

The wasteful and premature consumption of our forests has created alarm with regard to the maintenance of the necessary supply of timber, lumber, and forest products generally. These products are among the fundamental necessities of the life and industry of our people, and none have a greater interest in increasing our supply of these products than have the farmers. The growing demands of an increasing population are pressing upon a diminishing supply. The ownership of timber in this country has become practically a monopoly, and has passed for the most part into the hands of great corporations and interests which are speculating on the increasing scarcity. The Democratic Party, recognizing a constant demand of the people, has persistently sought to secure free lumber. It seems that the President has at last come to appreciate the importance of this demand, as shown in his advocacy of the Canadian reciprocity agreement. In his message of February 26, 1911, he said:

"Free lumber we ought to have. By giving our people access to Canadian forests we shall reduce the consumption of our own, which, in the hands of comparatively few owners, now have a value that requires the enlargement of our available timber resources."

We must give our people access to available supplies of lumber from all possible sources. Logs and round unmanufactured timber are already on the free list. This bill also exempts from duty timber, hewn, sided, or squared, round timber used for spars or in building wharves, and sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber; that is, practically all forms of lumber, except the hardwoods, lignum vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, and all other cabinet woods, practically all of which must be imported; on these hardwoods the existing duty of 20 per cent is detained for purposes of revenue only. Shingles, laths, and fencing posts are expressly exempted from duty by the bill.

The Democratic platform of 1908 explicitly demanded that lumber, timber, and logs be immediately placed upon the free list.

SEWING MACHINES.

Sewing machines are necessities in the homes of the people and should be purchased by our users at prices as favorable as those given to foreign users of American machines. It is well known that our manufacturers of these machines have for many years sold them at much lower prices for export to foreign countries than to consumers at home. American manufacturers have already proved that sewing machines are made here as cheaply as in any other part of the world. With free lumber, as provided for in this bill, our manufacturers will have an additional advantage.

SALT.

Salt is an article of general necessity and an important material in many industries. It is absolutely required as a food preservative. It is most desirable that for the health and welfare of our people this article, so necessary in the preparation and marketing of food products, be made free from any artificial enhancement of price. The domestic supply of salt is dependent upon a limited number of natural deposits. There has been a gradual concentration of forces among the producing interests, which are well able to meet foreign competition. It is provided in the existing tariff law that duties shall be remitted on imported salt in bond used in curing fish taken by vessels licensed to engage in the fisheries and in curing fish on the shores of the navigable waters of the United States; also that duties paid on imported salt used in curing meats in the United States shall be refunded on the exportation of such meats. There is no good reason for confining the advantages of these exemptions to these cases. It has been the Democratic policy to make this article entirely free from duty, as provided for in this bill.

The full scope of the importance and significance of the bill H. R. 4413, as related to the people and to the revenues to be remitted, is exhibited in Tables 2 to 7, showing the production and consumption of the articles affected by the bill and the exports and imports, with the duties from imports, for selected years. It has been necessary to confine the statistics of Table 2 to census years, as the census has of necessity been relied upon for production figures. The statistics of manufactures for 1910 are not yet available, except for lumber, laths, and shingles. A full explanation of the sources used in compiling the tables, together with instructions for using the statistics, will be found in the notes in connection therewith.

DUTIES.

As shown in Table 5, the exemption from duty of all the articles affected by the bill (H. R. 4413) would reduce the tariff revenue by the amount of $10,028,989, based on the importations for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1910. Included in this are the duties to be remitted under the Canadian reciprocity agreement, amounting to $1,653,313. Deducting this amount from the total remitted duties, $10,028,989, for 1910, it appears that the net amount of duties which would be remitted under the provisions of bill H. R. 4413, after allowing for the results of the Canadian reciprocity agreement, would be only $8,375,676. This amount is inconsiderable in comparison with the great saving and advantage to all of our people from the additions to the free list provided for, and the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

TABLE 2.—Domestic production, imports, exports, consumption, and per cent that production sustains to consumption with relation to the classes of articles carried by bill H. R. 4413, for selected years: 1890, 1900, and 1905.

[Production figures compiled from census reports; those of imports and exports from Commerce and Navigation, Bureau of Statistics, Department of Commerce and Labor. Because of lack of uniformity in classifications, the statistics of production are not in all instances strictly comparable, nor do they relate with precision to the classifications of the bill referred to. Close approximations have been attained, however, and important variations are cited in footnotes.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, personally I am in favor of voting against and shall vote against the President's veto at this time. The matter that I have to present comes from the woolgrowers of California, in an article prepared by Mr. Ellenwood, of Red Bluff, and presented to the California Woolgrowers' Association at Red Bluff, Cal., on December 22, 1910. When the National Woolgrowers' Association met at Portland, Oreg., on January 4 to 7, 1911, the opposition of the manufacturers engaged in the woolen industry was so strong that they prevented this man Ellenwood, who is the secretary of the California Woolgrowers Association, of Red Bluff, Cal., from even reading his paper to show the iniquitous workings of the Payne-Aldrich Schedule K. I desire to insert that document in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to inserting in the RECORD any long-winded argument in the middle of a real debate. Later on I shall have no objection to the gentleman inserting anything in the RECORD, but not in the middle of a real debate.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] is recognized for six minutes.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, the framers of the Constitution never lodged the veto power in the hands of the President for the purpose for which it has in this instance been used. It was vested for higher and more sacred purposes, to protect constitutional rights and executive prerogatives, and not to serve partisan expediencies.

Mr. Justice Story, in his work on the Constitution (vol. 1, p. 627), in speaking of the exercise of the veto power by the President, says:

> He will do it only on extraordinary occasion, when a just regard to the public safety or the public interest or a constitutional obligation or a necessity of maintaining the appropriate right and prerogatives of his office compels him to the step.

These are the instances this great author gives for it to be invoked, and a resort to it for any other purpose is unwarranted. For this veto none of these rights enumerated are invaded.

The veto to this measure for the reasons assigned in the message does not come within the definition of the eminent authority I have quoted. The veto to this bill is predicated upon two reasons only, namely: First, that the President is not satisfied that the duties fixed are the equivalent of "the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to the manufacturer," and the second reason is that the Tariff Board has not yet reported on this schedule. The former reason is based on the plank in the Republican national platform of 1908, providing for a revision of the tariff, and the latter objection has been improvised for an excuse for delaying tariff revision in order that the tariff barons may further plunder the consumers of this country, and neither of which furnish a valid reason for the exercise of the veto power. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

These are the main reasons he has given for the exercise of this extraordinary power for the defeat of this meritorious measure affecting the welfare of the entire population of the Republic.

For two years the President has been criticizing the woolen schedule as unjust and indefensible. He was certainly advised when he assailed it in his Winona speech and others, declaring it needed a revision downward, and now, when such a revision is made, passing both branches of Congress by large majorities, in compliance with the universal demand of the people from every section of the country, the President denies relief by exercising the veto power as the only means left to defeat the will of the people.

Will the country approve this action of the Chief Executive, and can he go before the people and justify his course, after having denounced this schedule as indefensible all over the country?

The people expected and had a right to expect his approval of this measure of relief passed in their behalf, and they will hold him responsible for its defeat, which is a great disappointment to the entire country.

This measure which he has vetoed reduced the duties on wool and woolen manufactures on an average of from 30 to 50 per cent, and would therefore have proven a great boon to every citizen of the Republic. It would have given them cheaper clothing—a necessity of life—and therefore inure to their common welfare. But the President appears and says: I know the existing schedule is too high, is indefensible, but I am not certain this measure literally complies with the plank in the Republican platform on the subject of tariff revision, and hence I will deny you a much needed relief and license the continuance of a conceded wrong in order that the great Woolen Trust may plunder 93,000,000 of people to swell its already overflowing coffers. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I deny that the framers of the Constitution ever lodged the veto power in the hands of the Chief Executive for any such purpose as employed by him to defeat this measure. It was made for a better and higher purpose than this, and from his exercise of it in this instance we appeal to the voters of the country to overthrow it at the ballot box in 1912 when they exercise their right of suffrage. If any error should be committed in this matter in rectifying the great wrong perpetrated on the people by the Payne tariff bill, would it not be much better to commit it in behalf of the many who have suffered much and long than in behalf of the few who have profited much and well by the law as it now stands and has stood for many years? To-day by his action on this bill he is applauded by the tariff beneficiaries and their votaries who have thrived at the expense of the public and who will continue to do so by the defeat of this measure, but 93,000,000 people in this country who will be made to suffer by it will repudiate his action at the election in 1912 by their ballots. As winter approaches they have asked for cheaper and better clothing; both branches of Congress have responded to their demands, and with the veto he defeats and denies their demands and the wishes of Congress. To him alone the responsibility belongs, and for it he must answer at the bar of public opinion, where he will be arraigned. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] in defending the action of the President said "that no great interest would suffer because of the delay the defeat of this measure would occasion."

No; great interests will not suffer, but great numbers of people will suffer thereby.

Better, I take it, that great interests suffer than compel humanity to suffer in order that great interests may thrive. The man is of higher and better consideration, or at least should be, than the dollar. Better, for this reason, the delay should not be made, and relief extended to the many who have been long and heavily burdened. This measure would relieve them, but the veto denies it to them. This measure stops the taxation of the people on this line of manufactures in the interests of private investments and removes the impositions foisted upon the public for private gain; the veto continues it and upholds the exploitation of the masses for selfish ends and predatory gains, and for this reason the public will repudiate his action. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has said in defending the veto that there is no great demand for a revision of the woolen schedule now. Has he so soon forgotten the result of the election of 1910? Tariff revision was the issue, and the people by an overwhelming majority decided for immediate tariff revision, denouncing the woolen schedule as written in the Payne law the most odious of all and demanded that it be revised downward. Has he forgotten that on this issue the large Republican majority of the last Congress was wiped out and a large Democratic majority was returned in this Congress commissioned to revise the tariff downward?

Is not the gentleman from Kansas aware of the fact that within the last 30 days a great metropolitan paper in the Mississippi Valley—the Chicago Tribune—has taken a poll of 4,000 editors, residing in that great valley, irrespective of politics, on the subject of revising the tariff, and that nearly 2,900 of them were for immediate revision? An overwhelming majority demanded revision downward.

These men not only speak their own sentiments, but those of a majority of the people residing in their communities. They are the heralders of public sentiment and the couriers of public thought.

Are gentlemen on that side of the Chamber so wedded to standpatism that they defy public demands, deny public petitions, and repudiate public mandates? Are they so infatuated with the doctrine of protection that public weal must be subordinated for the selfish aggrandizement of special interests; that they approve the power of one man to override the will of a great majority of both branches of Congress in executing the will of the great majority of the American people? If so, the victory thus gained will be of short duration and will prove to be their Waterloo in 1912.

Standpatism may to-day triumph under the shelter of the President's veto, protection may be extended in its era of plunder, special interests may flourish a little longer by the employment of this extraordinary constitutional power, but back at our homes reside the source of all power in this great Republic—the people—patiently awaiting the opportunity to express their mandate through the medium of the ballot box, when and where they will register their solemn disapproval of the defeat of this measure by the veto power exercised by the President on this occasion. Already the lines of battle for the great contest of 1912 are being formed; already the hosts of freemen of this country are training for the conflict; already the issues are defined, the question of taxation will be paramount, tariff reform, revision downward will be the great battle cry, and when our great captain is named to lead our legions the march to victory will continue until the hour for closing the polls on election day in November, 1912, when success will crown our efforts by the election of a Democratic President, a Democratic Senate, and the reelection of a Democratic House of Representatives by an overwhelming majority, and the triumph of tariff reform will prevail and the veto power will not defeat, but the approval of the Chief Executive will accentuate the good work in carrying out the mandate of the people in enforcing the legislation of their chosen Representatives in Congress. We accept the issue thus tendered and are ready for the conflict. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to this debate. Not one word has been said up to this time in defense of the present rates under Schedule K. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I consider that remarkable and very significant. We have been attempting to revise the tariff schedule by schedule, a plan which President Taft says prevents logrolling. It can not, therefore, be urged that the veto of this bill should be sustained because this bill has any relation whatever to any other schedule. That is to say, no friend of the administration can offer such objection to a revision of the wool schedule; for we have been revising the tariff in exact accordance with the suggestion of the President.

Now, what is the situation?

The Constitution of the United States provides that whenever the President shall fail to sign a bill he shall return it to the House in which the bill originated, together with his "objections" to the same. Mr. Speaker, this veto message contains no objection to the bill which has just been returned to this House. In substance the President admits that it may be a good bill. He does not say the import duties imposed are too low; he does not say that these rates fail to cover the difference in cost here and abroad. The only objection offered by the President consists in his own lack of information. This is not a veto message, Mr. Speaker; it is a plea in confession and avoidance. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There is one schedule in the Payne law which has no defender on this floor so far as we have heard up to this time. It has often been charged that Schedule K in the Dingley law was written by an agent of the woolen manufacturers. One thing is certain, those rates are indefensible, and another thing is also certain, and that is the influence of the woolen manufacturers was strong enough to have Schedule K in the Dingley bill brought forward and incorporated in the Payne bill with little change. In this very message the President himself condemns the unjust rates in the Payne law. He "shares in the belief that many rates in the present schedule are too high and in excess of any needed protection for woolgrower or manufacturer."

Long has been the struggle of the people to have this outrage corrected. Many are the ways by which righteous legislation can be defeated. I venture the statement right here that the day after the President made his famous Winona speech there was not a man in the United States who believed he would veto a bill which levies a duty of 49 per cent on woolen goods and clothing and a duty of 29 per cent on raw wool. The President expresses great solicitude for "more than a million of our countrymen engaged in the production of wool and the manufacture of woolens." He is afraid that they may be injuriously affected by reducing the duty on raw wool to 29 per cent and the duty on woolen goods and clothing to 49 per cent. The President admits that present rates are too high, and he will not say that 29 and 49 per cent are too low. In fact these rates may afford more protection than the woolgrowers and wool manufacturers of the country need. The President does not say. He does not even express an opinion. He simply says he does not know, and inasmuch as he is in doubt, he will give the Woolen Trust the benefit of the doubt and veto the bill. The Constitution says he must return the bill with his "objections," and in this instance the objection offered by the President consists in his own lack of information. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, the Tariff Board has been in existence for two years. Is it possible that this board, constituted upon the recommendation of the President, could not find out in two years whether 29 per cent on raw wool and 49 per cent on cloth and clothing is sufficient to cover the difference in cost here and abroad?

More than this, Mr. Speaker, this bill has been pending in this House and the Senate for a good long time. Everybody knew long ago that Schedule K was going to be revised. The President himself must have known this four months ago; why did he not then direct his Tariff Board to go to work and report? He would have had ample information by this time. Why did not the President begin a little investigating on his own account four months ago? O Mr. Speaker, this message offers but poor apology indeed for refusing to sign this bill. Is it possible that the nearly 500 representatives of the people in this Chamber and in the Chamber at the other end of this building are in total ignorance of the effect of this measure?

With a wave of his hand the President brushes aside 92 Senators and 391 Members of this House and tells us we must await the sweet pleasure of his Tariff Board. Mr. Speaker, the solicitude of the President for the million people engaged in raising and manufacturing wool is very great, but he shows little if any solicitude in this message for the more than 90,000,000 of people who buy woolen goods and wear woolen clothes. He has abdicated in favor of his Tariff Board. He will, of course, accept the verdict of that board when it sees fit to make a report. Do you think, Mr. Speaker, the people of this Nation are going to submit tamely to this program? Here is a schedule admitted to be an outrage, a schedule written at the dictation of the Wool Trust, a schedule which the President says is too high, a schedule without a friend on this floor, and yet the millions in this Nation must continue to suffer and pay tribute to monopoly because the President tells us his Tariff Board has not made a report.

If the five men who constitute that board are to be allowed to say just what Congress and the President must do, then we had better amend the Constitution at once so that these gentlemen will not be annoyed in the performance of their duties by any interference by Congress or by the President himself.

This veto message is a poor plea in confession and avoidance. The President does not know and his Tariff Board has not told him whether 49 per cent covers the difference in the cost of goods and clothing here and abroad. This veto message is the echo of his Winona speech.

The Constitution, Mr. Speaker, does not provide that tariff rates shall be imposed or changed by any tariff board. That is the duty of Congress and the President. A great fight for the people was won when this bill went to the President. If he did not know whether 49 per cent covered the difference in cost here and abroad, he ought to have taken time to find out. I know I speak the truth when I say that there is a majority in this Chamber at least ready and willing to remain here until the President has had ample time to get full information concerning the effect of this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This veto, Mr. Speaker, is a partisan veto. The action of the President is a distinct disappointment to all who believed he would rise above party prejudice. This bill is so eminently just that it received a large Republican support in this Chamber and passed a Republican Senate. It is a bill which will bring some measure of relief to 90,000,000 of consumers of this Nation. Let us keep history straight. It has behind it a great majority in this House and in the Senate. The only hope cherished by our stand-pat Republican friends is that they will be able to muster enough strength to prevent the passing of the bill over the President's veto. They will probably succeed now, but the day is not far distant when this schedule will be reduced. The President has raised an issue which can not be misunderstood. As a Democrat I welcome that issue. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask what is the time remaining on both sides?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has 13 minutes, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has 25.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STANLEY. Has the President of the United States vetoed a Democratic tariff bill, or has he signed the death warrant of the Republican Party? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MANN. Nor even an intelligent one.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, it goes without saying that it would be utterly impossible to discuss this question at any length in the short time assigned to me.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], who opened the debate on the other side, assailed the existence of the veto power in the President of the United States, denounced the Tariff Board, and denounced the President of the United States. So far as his first point, the existence of the veto power, is concerned, nothing more need be said now than was said in the very eloquent defense of it made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. He might have gone further and testified to the fact that some of the most important chapters in American history have been written in veto messages. I have on my desk a single volume in which there are two veto messages that did as much as anything else that I can now recall to contribute to the welfare of the American people—one the courageous veto by President Grant of the bill to inflate the currency, the other the equally courageous veto by President Hayes of the silver bill. There has been some doleful history growing out of the failure of Presidents to exercise this veto power. If the President of the United States who denounced the Wilson bill as a measure of perfidy and dishonor had had the courage of his convictions, we might have escaped the panic of 1893.

In striking contrast to that failure upon his part to exercise his power is the courageous action of the heroic President who occupies the White House to-day in sending back to Congress this ill-digested, ill-considered legislation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy the time of the House no further, except to ask to have read as a part of my speech the editorial from the Washington Post which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WOOL BILL VETO.

The hodge-podge wool bill, framed for the purpose of "putting Taft in a hole," got its knockout from the President as soon as the blow could be delivered. There was no hesitation whatever in meeting the issue. If anybody thinks, in the face of the President's message, that the American people can be fooled into believing that Mr. Taft is against good-faith tariff legislation, he would better revise his notion as to the gullibility of the public.

The message is written with patience and in good temper and dignity, but throughout it is a scathing arraignment of the blended partisanship and intrigue that attempted to make capital by a fake appeal to the popular demand for tariff reduction.

Mr. Taft reminds Congress that he was elected on a platform that supported the policy of protection, the standard of protection to be the ascertained difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. In pursuance of this plan the Tariff Board was created and money appropriated for the collection of facts upon which Congress could proceed intelligently to revise the tariff. The Tariff Board was directed to take up the wool schedule and report by December 1 next. It is now engaged in that work. Meanwhile, a combination of Democrats and insurgent Republicans forces through Congress a wool bill which is neither Republican nor Democratic, protective nor revenue only. Mr. Taft calls it a blend of revenue only and antiprotection with "professed protection." It is not based upon any known facts regarding wool growing or manufacture. It is pure guesswork, so far as it affects the wool industry. Its object was political, not industrial or fiscal. It sought to make the wool industry the stalking-horse for an attack upon the President.

The President does not mention these facts in his message, and it is not necessary that he should. The public knows exactly why the wool bill was jammed through in August, without facts to work upon, instead of waiting until December, when facts would have been available. Mr. Taft's prompt action in vetoing the bill was expected. No one can imagine him taking any other course. Approval of the bill would have been an admission that the Tariff Board was a mockery and a failure, and that politics was to be the sole rule of reason in revising the tariff. It would have placed Mr. Taft in the attitude of being willing to sacrifice pledges and conscientious revision for the sake of rushing to the people with a half-baked law purporting to meet their wishes. Those who doubted his courage in meeting the issue are now aware that it is a big job to "put Taft in a hole."

The business men of the country of all brands of politics will breathe easier now that they know that a fearless President will not permit the enactment of tariff bills for politics' sake only.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman from New York to yield the balance of his time, as I intend to yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] to close the debate.

Mr. PAYNE. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I will vote "no" on the motion to overrule the President's veto. I do not ask every gentleman who votes "no" to agree with me as to my reason for voting "no." The material thing is the vote.

I vote "no" because I believe that I know enough about the cost of production in the United States of wool and of woolens to say that I am satisfied that this bill is not a protective measure. [Applause on the Republican side.] And if there is any doubt about it on either side of the House, I will call on the gentleman from Alabama to confirm my statement that it is not a protective bill. He is silent. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

I oppose it because it is not protective. I do not apologize for my position touching the protective policy. I do not believe this bill is protective, because it is substantially the same as to woolens that the Wilson bill enacted, your pet that your honorable Speaker voted for and advocated, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] as well. It was enacted into law. The proof of the pudding is the eating of it. Some of us recollect what that bill did, or was the most material factor in doing. It closed and it bankrupted practically the industries of the country.

Ah, the gentlemen on the other side say as to the capitalists: "Damn the capitalists; damn the man that has a woolen factory; it is a wicked trust. Damn! damn! damn!" [Laughter on the Republican side.] There were 3,000,000 men working in productive industries and on their products that were thrown out of employment. That is what it did. They, learning through their stomachs as to the effect of it, helped pull down the rocks and the mountains on your heads.

But a great part of the people who lived in 1896 have crossed over and a new set have come in, and you have been demagoguing them and misrepresenting to them that they can have full employment at the present or better wage and get every other man's product for less money. [Applause on the Republican side.] The rocks and mountains will fall upon you again, I hope, in 1912, and I know in 1914 and in 1916. And while I am an old man, I expect to be here to see. [Laughter and applause.]

Oh, I listened to the eloquent gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and his running mate from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] [laughter], and they both abound—I will omit a part of the quotation—"in tales full of sound and fury signifying nothing." [Laughter.] I omit a part of the quotation, because I do not desire to be offensive.

Mr. Speaker, I voted for the Payne tariff bill. I agree with the statement that the President of the United States made—that it is the best tariff bill ever passed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I agree with him in that statement. I voted for the bill. I have no apology to make for it. I can stand by that bill. But, says somebody, can not you take a microscope and find something to criticise? Great heavens, yes! But I can see elephants in all your tariff legislation when you were in power, where, in comparison, with the highest magnifying glass you can not see gnats in the Payne tariff bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Oh, I hope our honorable Speaker, for whom personally I have great respect, when he comes to close this debate, as he is to do, will explain a little bit about how cold he has been heretofore for the want of woolen clothing. I know that he will close it, and close it ably, from his standpoint.

Mr. Speaker, I believe as much as I believe that I stand here that with a political campaign already commenced—on now—that every 30 days, with your conducting that campaign, practically holding up the business of the country, rendering the people on the farm and in the factory and in the mines uncertain and doubtful, with a constantly decreasing consumption, which means a constantly decreasing production—I believe that during this special session of Congress you, by your efforts to revise the revenue laws, have cost 02,000,000 people more money than would be saved to them in a decade even if your contentions were correct about Schedule K. Sit down and figure it up and you will see what it amounts to.

We are ready. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is somewhat of disagreement, something of contention on our side that crops out. Long years of prosperity, you know, breed contentions. You are seemingly better together than we are now, but if you come into power in 1913 you will render respectable any hair pulling that we have had on our side. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I have heard curses—not loud, but very emphatic—from many gentlemen who occupy seats on that side.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, from 1860 to 1910 the population of the country increased from 31,000,000 to 92,000,000. During the same time the wealth of the country increased from $16,000,000,000 to $137,000,000,000, and during the five years from 1905 to 1910 the increase of the wealth was $30,000,000,000, nearly twice as much as the entire accumulation of wealth in 1860, when the Democratic Party let loose the control of the country.

There were savings deposits in the country in 1860, $149,000,000, and in 1910, $4,070,000,000. The increase from 1900 to 1910 was from $2,389,000,000 to $4,070,000,000. And the increase of depositors in the savings banks of the country from 4,258,000 in 1890 to 6,107,000 in 1900 and 9,142,000 in 1910 as against 693,000 in 1860.

The expenditures for public schools in 1870 were $63,000,000. In 1900 they were $214,000,000; in 1909 they nearly doubled in 10 years to $401,000,000.

There was invested in the manufacturing industries of the country in 1900, $8,978,000,000; and in 1910, $18,237,000,000, an increase of more than 100 per cent in 10 years.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield to a gentleman who so much lacks judgment as he now shows.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to know how much of that is watered stock?

Mr. MANN. There was an increase in the amount paid to the employees of these manufacturing establishments from $2,390,000,000 in 1900 to $4,353,000,000 in 1910; an increase in the number of employees from 5,079,000 in 1900 to 7,399,000 in 1910; an increase in the primary horsepower employed from 10,000,000 in 1900 to 19,000,000 in 1910; an increase in the value of the products produced from $11,000,000,000 in 1900 to $20,000,000,000 in 1910. [Applause on the Republican side.] There was an increase in the products of the textile manufacturing establishments from $886,000,000 in 1900 to $1,592,000,000 in 1910; of salaries and wages paid from $217,000,000 in 1900 to $349,000,000 in 1910; of persons employed from 647,000 in 1900 to 861,000 in 1910, and of capital employed from $982,000,000 in 1900 to $1,709,000,000 in 1910. These enormous increases, the greatest progress which ever has been made by any country at any period of the world's history, were the result of the economic policy adopted and put in force by the Republican Party. [Applause on the Republican side.] You propose to tear that down. You propose to kill that which we have erected, if you can. There is but one parallel that I know of in history or in literature to your attempt, and that is the one recited in Æsop's Fables of the man who killed the goose that laid the golden egg. [Applause on the Republican side.]

"A woodcutter bought him a gander,
Or at least that was what he supposed;
As a matter of fact, 'twas a slander,
As a later occurrence disclosed;
For they locked the bird up in the garret
To fatten, the while it grew old,
And it laid there a twenty-two-carat
Fine egg of the purest of gold.

There was much unaffected rejoicing
In the home of the woodcutter then,
And his wife, her exuberance voicing,
Proclaimed him most lucky of men.
"'Tis an omen of fortune, this gold egg,"
She said, "and of practical use,
For this fowl doesn't lay any old egg,
She's a highly superior goose."

'Twas this creature's habitual custom,
This laying of superfine eggs,
And they made it their practice to dust 'em
And pack them by dozens in kegs;
But the woodcutter's mind being vapid
And his foolishness more than profuse,
In order to get them more rapid
He slaughtered the innocent goose.

He made her a gruel of acid,
Which she very obligingly ate,
And at once with a touchingly placid
Demeanor succumbed to her fate.
With affection that passed the platonic
They buried her under the moss,
And her epitaph wasn't ironic
In stating, "We mourn for our loss."

And the moral: It isn't much use,
As the woodcutter found to be true,
To lay for an innocent goose
Just because she is laying for you."

[Carryl.]

[Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

You Democrats have as much sense as the woodcutter and as much ignorance. You would destroy the industries of the country, and against your assault upon them we stand to defend the industries and the honor of the country. [Applause on the Republican side.] To-day we will show you that we are standing behind the President, and that before you revise the tariff we will go to the country on the question whether you will kill the goose that laid the golden eggs, whether you will destroy the economic policy that has made our country the most prosperous and happy in all the world. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] said we were in favor of taking care of the sheep, "but how about the half-clad children." Mr. Speaker, we live in America. We take care of the sheep, but we have no half-clad children. [Applause on the Republican side]. But when you get in power they will be lucky to get any clothing at all. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

GENERAL FARM STATISTICS FOR 1910.

The Bureau of the Census has completed for the United States as a whole some of the more general figures resulting from the census of agriculture in April, 1910.

The number of farms in 1910 was 6,340,120, as compared with 5,737,372 in 1900, an increase of 11 per cent.

The land in farms increased in 1900 from 835,092,000 acres to 873,703,000 in 1910, or 5 per cent, but a larger increase, 15 per cent, is noted in improved acreage, which in 1900 was 414,490,000 acres and in 1910, 477,424,000 acres.

More conspicuous than the increase in the number and acreage of farms has been the increase in the improved values of farm property.

The land in farms rose in value from $13,051,033,000 in 1900 to $28,383,821,000 in 1910, an increase of 118 per cent, and during the same period the average value of all land in farms, per acre, rose from $15.60 to $32.50, or 108 per cent.

Farm buildings, which in 1900 were valued at $3,556,614,000, were reported in 1910 as worth $6,294,025,000, an increase of 77 per cent.

Farm implements and machinery, reported in 1910 as worth $1,261,817,000 and 10 years previously as worth $749,778,000, show an increase of 68 per cent.

IRON AND STEEL SCHEDULE.

In the Payne tariff law we made a considerable reduction in the tariff on iron and steel. It is interesting to note the effect of that reduction, especially on the Pacific coast.

I have obtained from the Treasury Department the importations of iron and steel at San Francisco and Portland, Oreg., for the year ending April 24, 1911. These importations are under the Payne tariff law. I have compared these importations with those for the year ending June 30, 1909, the last fiscal year under the Dingley tariff law.

The value of the importations at San Francisco increased from $437,294 for the above year of 1909 to $1,045,038 for the above year ending April 24, 1911. And the value of the importations at Portland, Oreg., increased from $54,024 for the prior year to $237,158 for the latter year.

The value of the importations of iron and steel at Port Townsend, Wash., or Puget Sound, increased from $231,394 for the year ending June 30, 1909, to $683,023 for the year ending March 31, 1911, and the total value of iron and steel importations at the three ports named increased from $722,712 for the prior year under the Dingley law to $1,965,219 for the latter year under the Payne law.

The increase at San Francisco, stated in pounds, was from Great Britain 17,029,214 pounds to 31,730,932 pounds.

From Germany from 7,457,507 pounds to 18,139,751 pounds.

From Belgium from 10,738,640 pounds to 31,653,785 pounds.

At Portland, Oreg., the increase from Great Britain was from 2,352,000 pounds to 12,234,880 pounds.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. UNDERWOOD). The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I fully agree with my well-beloved friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that the growth of this country since 1860, in wealth and in every other respect, has been phenomenal. No man rejoices in that more than I do. I permit no living human being to be more patriotic than I am. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I suppose his figures are correct, but the gentleman leaves out of his calculations the most important element of growth in the United States since 1860, and that is the growth in population [applause on the Democratic side]; and surely no Republican will dare to claim that the Republicans begat all that increase in population. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Democrats did their full share in that regard. Who created this wealth? Democrats had as much to do with increasing it as the Republicans had. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It makes me weary to hear people talk about somebody wanting to destroy the industries and prosperity of this land. It is a lie. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] No sane man wants to injure in the estimation of a hair any legitimate industry of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That that charge is a thing incredible I have contended always, and especially since we carried the House and had the responsibility placed upon us. We all want the industries of the land to prosper. It is our country as well as yours; our children must live here as well as yours; we have as great a stake in the prosperity of the Republic as you have; and, in the language of Tiny Tim, "God bless us, every one." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The President has the constitutional right to veto this bill if he wanted to do so. I am not quarreling with him about that. I am, as his personal friend, lamenting his lack of wisdom. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He has raised an issue which will rage with unabated fury until the close of the polls in November, 1912. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We most cheerfully welcome that issue. We will meet the President and his stand-pat cohorts at Philippi. You gentlemen talk about our putting the President in a hole. We did not have to do so; he has done it for himself. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, nevertheless and notwithstanding, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] stated the literal historic truth when he said that the right of veto is a remnant of the royal prerogative. He was correct also when he stated that no English sovereign has dared to exercise the veto power in something like 200 years. If George the Fifth should veto an important measure he would lose his crown and his throne and be sent on his "travels," as Charles the Second facetiously denominated his banishment. My good friend from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] who nominated me for President—and I rejoice in the fact that the Republican Members of this House feel as kindly toward me personally as the Democrats do [applause]—it is a matter of infinite pride with me—the gentleman got this Tariff Board business wrong. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and myself never advocated this Tariff Board. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We never voted for it. I will tell you what we did advocate and what we did vote for, and that is to make that board a board of real experts and then make it responsive to the House of Representatives in general and to the Ways and Means Committee in particular. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am willing to do that now. I am not going to say anything derogatory of this Tariff Board, but I am going to say what I think, as I always do. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and all the rest of the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means who served on that committee in the Sixtieth and Sixty-first Congresses when the Payne-Aldrich bill was framed and passed, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who, while he was not present when the first tariff bill was made in 1789, has been present at nearly all the rest of them [laughter]; and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY], who were also on the old Ways and Means Committee—any one of them knows more about the tariff to-day than that entire Tariff Board rolled together. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I name only the old Members; but I will say that the new Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee were selected for their fitness for such work; and I desire to bear witness in this distinguished presence to the fact that no set of men ever worked harder, more persistently, or more painstakingly in the discharge of a duty than have the Democratic Members of the committee in revising Schedule K and the cotton schedule. They all deserve well of the House and of the country. I am rather inclined to the opinion that my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and myself know something about tariff bills, too. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He voted against the Payne tariff bill—bless his heart for doing it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I yielded him 20 minutes time to make his speech, the best one he ever made in his life. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The members of the Tariff Board are, no doubt, most excellent and learned gentlemen; but whatever else they may be, they are not tariff experts. To hear certain persons tell it, all Senators and Representatives in Congress are idiots, utterly ignorant of the tariff question, and should not be permitted to do anything touching the tariff except to register the decrees of the Tariff Board of nonexperts. I throw out this gentle hint: If the Tariff Board is to be used as the President is using it in this case to delay tariff revision instead of expediting it, it will have a short shrift as certain as grass grows or water runs. The Tariff Board, if it continues to exist, should be made the servant and not the master of the Representatives of the people. Why do not the little Solomons, who go about asseverating that Congress is composed of a lot of ignoramuses on the tariff, come to Congress themselves and pass a model tariff bill? They do not come for the all-sufficient reason that they can not get votes enough. The people declared last November that they desired tariff revision, and they will not be enamored of those who block that work.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] voted for this bill. What change has come o'er the spirit of his dream? Is it the sweet odor of the fleshpots of Egypt or not? [Applause on the Democratic side.] These gentlemen supporting the President's veto message have all said—every one of them who made a speech that I have heard—that this wool bill is unconsidered. The standpatters are unanimous on that proposition.

I do not propose to have that kind of a statement go unchallenged to the country, because it is absolutely untrue. What happened? We called a Democratic caucus of the Democratic Members-elect of this House on the 19th day of January. The purpose of that proceeding was to select the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means that they might go to work preparing tariff bills. That was before anybody dreamed of this extra session. Some of the newspaper Republican brethren said it was my "crazy scheme," but it worked like a charm. We chose the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, and they went to work and spent nearly three months preparing this wool bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I defy my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to state that he and his committee ever spent three months on any one schedule in the tariff bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I wish to say that we spent more than 10 times as much time on this woolen schedule than you did.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When was it? When did you spend it? I will give you a piece of history you seem to have forgotten. A tariff bill has 14 schedules in it. You and I and the rest of your committee began considering the Payne bill with the 14 schedules on the 11th day of November, and you reported that bill to this House with the 14 schedules on the 18th day of March. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I commenced the preparation of that bill more than a year before the committee met.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And so did we, bless your soul. I have been preparing for the wool bill and other tariff for the last 20 years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. But I want to ask the gentleman what that has to do with this mongrel thing that comes from the conference committee?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. After the House considered this bill the Senate considered it. The gentleman had to give up a good deal of his own bill two years ago, and sulked, and swore, and was peeved because he had to yield. That is the truth.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, he did not yield the whole thing.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You yielded all you could.

Another thing, they say that we are playing politics. Whenever any man stands up and undertakes to do anything for the benefit of the great masses of people he is denounced by the "interests" as a demagogue and is charged with playing politics. But to stand up and advocate the cause of the "interests" is the highest evidence of statesmanship. As far as I am individually concerned, I sprang from the loins of the common people, God bless them, and I am one of them. I labored with my hands in my youth, and would do it again to-morrow if I had to do so; and I unhesitatingly take my stand with the consumers of the land as against the "interests."

The President desires to have tariff legislation postponed till his Tariff Board can tutor him up sufficiently to write a tariff bill, which, when we consider his multifarious and onerous duties and his passion for long-distance traveling and frequent speechmaking, we must perforce conclude would be a far-away day in the sweet by and by. We do not want the people to suffer that long.

The President made a famous speech at Winona, Minn. The only part of that speech which was any good [laughter] was that part of it in which he said the wool schedule was too high and ought to be reduced. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Here are his exact words on that celebrated occasion:

> With respect to the wool schedule, I agree that it is too high and that it ought to have been reduced, and that it probably represents considerably more than the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production here. The difficulty about the woolen schedule is that there were two contending factions early in the history of Republican tariffs, to wit, woolgrowers and the woolen manufacturers, and that finally, many years ago, they settled on a basis by which wool in the grease should have 11 cents a pound, and by which allowance should be made for the shrinkage of the washed wool in the differential upon woolen manufactures. The percentage of duty was very heavy—quite beyond the difference in the cost of production, which was not then regarded as a necessary or proper limitation upon protective duties.

Those words sank deep into the minds of the American people. They made them the basis of hope for cheaper and warmer blankets and clothing. Now, so far as in him lies, the President dashes those fond hopes to the ground; but what's writ is writ, and those presidential words are part of the history of the Republic.

It is asked why we took the wool schedule first. I will tell you. We took it because the President said that it ought to be reduced [applause on the Democratic side], because we faced a hostile Senate and faced a hostile President. This bill is not what I would have written if I had had carte blanche; it is not what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] would have written; it is not what any of us would have written; but we undertook to get a bill that would have the best chance possible of passing the ordeal of the House, the ordeal of the Senate, and the ordeal of the White House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I was certain that the President would sign the bill cutting down the wool tariff; we took him at his word. That is the head and front of our offending in putting the revision of the wool schedule first. I never did believe he would veto it until the last two or three days. Then, we took the cotton schedule next, because it, too, is a textile schedule. I am violating no secret in stating that so soon as the revised cotton schedule was through the House, the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee began industriously to prepare the iron and steel schedule revision, having previously collected a large assortment of information on that subject.

We welcome the issue. We are not afraid to go to the people on it. We know that we stand for right and truth and justice. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] quotes Æsop's Fables. Æsop was, perhaps, the greatest writer of fables that ever lived; but nobody ever rated him as an authority on economics till the gentleman from Illinois arose to-day. We have no desire to kill the goose that lays the golden eggs, as the gentleman seems to think. What we do desire is that a few shall not monopolize the golden eggs, but that they shall be distributed more equitably among the people of the land. The most important problem that good, wise, and patriotic men have to solve is a fair distribution of the profits of business; and blessed be the name of the man forever who achieves the solution which is just.

The Globe-Democrat said that I had come around to a tariff on wool because I had heard the bleating of 134,000 sheep in my district. I tell you what I did hear. I heard the cry of 93,000,000 American citizens for cheaper and better clothing. The great desire of my heart is to give them some relief from their burden of taxation which they have borne for lo! these many years. [Loud and prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on this bill may extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on this bill have the right to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. RAKER. Does that include the remarks of myself?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It does.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is, Will the House on reconsideration agree to pass the bill, the objection of the President to the contrary notwithstanding? Under the Constitution the roll must be called, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of passing this bill over the President's veto will say "aye," and those opposed, "no."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 227, nays 129, answered "present" 3, not voting 27, as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Platt, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 12812. An act to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

CRIMINAL LAWS RELATING TO THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask present consideration for the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] asks present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of Public Law No. 350, Sixtieth Congress, second session, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," be printed for the use of the House document room.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report of the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows (H. Rept. 151):

The Committee on Printing having had under consideration the House resolution (H. Res. 286) providing for the printing of 5,000 copies of Public Law No. 350, Sixtieth Congress, second session, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The estimate of cost is $127.85.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman who presents this resolution whether he has considered the advisability of authorizing a reprint of the penal code as well as the judicial code.

Mr. FINLEY. The committee has authorized and reported a resolution to reprint the penal code.

Mr. SHERLEY. Has the gentleman considered the advisability of having an index to both of these codes before a reprint is had?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. There is an index to the penal code.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am informed that there is an index to the penal code, but there is none to the other.

Mr. FINLEY. We have an index to the penal code. The committee is without the power to order an index to the judicial code, and we are complying with a public demand.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE FREE LIST.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read (S. Doc. No. 102):

To the House of Representatives:

I return, without my approval, House bill 4413, entitled—

An act to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles.

This free list covers articles in the metal schedule, the cotton schedule, the wool schedule, and the leather schedule. In a special message returning, without my approval, the wool bill, I have set forth at length the reasons why I think all general amendments to the existing tariff laws should be postponed until accurate and scientific information can be submitted to Congress by a Tariff Board appointed for the purpose of investigating the question of the difference in cost of production of dutiable articles at home and abroad. The same reasons which impelled me to decline to sign the wool bill control me in this case. There are other reasons apparent on the face of the bill, taken in connection with the existing law, which make it unwise to allow this bill to pass.

The bill is so carelessly drawn that it would inevitably lead to the greatest uncertainty as to what articles are or are not covered by its various provisions. This would impose a heavy burden on the administrative branch of the Government, create disastrous uncertainty in commercial circles, and lead to a burdensome amount of litigation. The bill, while apparently very simple and affecting only a few articles, is in reality so loose in its phraseology that it would affect hundreds of items in the existing tariff act. Conceding the wisdom of its general policy, the paragraphs of the bill ought to be rewritten in definite and specific terms.

Take the expression in the first clause, following the specific mention of agricultural implements, "all other agricultural implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, whether in whole or in parts, including repair parts." This language is so sweeping that it might be made to cover almost 150 articles used in agriculture, which would affect many sections of the present tariff and lead to the most injurious uncertainty. Furthermore, it would make it possible to import free many materials now paying a duty, when roughly fashioned into the form of parts of farm implements but actually intended for entirely different uses.

Again, take the general expression in the second clause, the bagging clause, "other material suitable for bagging or sacking agricultural products." It is a serious question whether this section might not be interpreted to make radical changes in many sections of Schedules I (cotton), J (jute and hemp), and K (wool), and it would undoubtedly be open to the same objection of allowing free entry to a large amount of textile manufactures, technically suitable for sacking agricultural products, but intended for entirely different purposes.

Another clause that calls for comment is in the leather paragraph, which reads as follows: "Leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles." The history of this clause is informing as to the method of drafting the bill. The phraseology is found in a proviso at the end of paragraph 451 of the existing tariff. The whole paragraph imposes various duties on different kinds of leather, including many more varieties than are made free by this bill, and the language of the proviso is used in the existing law to impose an additional ad valorem duty on all such leather when cut into forms for further manufacture. The draftsman of the bill now before me took this language, struck out the 10 per cent ad valorem, and left the preceding descriptions of leather out of which the forms were to be cut, dutiable as under the present law. The result is that calfskins tanned, kangaroo, sheep and goat skins, dressed and finished, bookbinders' calfskins, chamois skins, patent and enameled leather, pianoforte leather, and other varieties of leather, when uncut, would pay, under the proposed bill, if it became a law, duties ranging from the equivalent of 40 per cent ad valorem down; while the cut forms of such leather would come in free. This imposes a penalty on the domestic labor of cutting and would transfer half the process in the industry of shoemaking and glove making to foreign countries. The result is so unreasonable as to suggest great haste in preparation.

Another clause equally full of difficulty is that admitting free, "Barbed fence wire, wire rods, wire strands, or wire rope, wire woven or manufactured for wire fencing, and other kinds of wire suitable for fencing, including wire staples." This section seems to be drawn with the idea of giving free wire for fencing purposes, but is so loosely worded that it might be taken to include also the highest grades of wire rods and wire rope. This is especially true, because wire rope is never used for fencing, and the words "wire rods, wire strands, or wire rope" are separated by commas from the rest of the section, and it is difficult, with the collocation of terms here used, and in face of the fact that wire rope is not used for fencing at all, to limit "wire rods, strands and rope" here made free to something suitable for fencing.

The truth is that the language of the act is so ambiguous and possibly all-embracing that it is impracticable for the Treasury Department to give an exact estimate as to the diminution in revenue which will follow its passage. The estimates vary all the way from $10,000,000 to $14,000,000, according to the varieties of construction put upon the act and this, although when the bill was first under consideration it was publicly stated by its advocates that the reduction in revenue would not exceed $1,500,000.

The difficulty with the bill is that in the sections above referred to it purports to secure a free list for the benefit of a certain class of users; but to classify articles by their use or their suitability for a certain use is so contrary to the methods of classification in the existing tariff law that its adoption would create the utmost confusion. The danger is not so much that the class of users in whose favor the classification purports to be made will receive more benefit than the framers of the law may have intended, but it is that many who do not belong to the class intended to be favored will import articles suitable for the prescribed use under the general terms of the statute, but will use them for other and general purposes. The effect will be to break down altogether the classification upon which the arrangement in many of the present tariff schedules is based. If there were no other reason for withholding my approval from this bill, this one would be all-sufficient.

But there is another, and a very important, reason why the bill ought not become a law, and that is that in many instances it adopts the principle, rarely permitted in any revenue system, on whatever theory constructed, by which the finished product is made free from duty and the raw material and the machinery necessary for its production are kept on the dutiable list. Even the most extreme free trader, or advocate of tariff for revenue only, has never before sought an adjustment of the duties which subjects the manufacturer to a burden in his manufacture by imposing a duty on the machinery and the raw material he uses and involves him in unrestricted foreign competition as to the finished product. This is true with reference to leather and shoes, with reference to material for bagging, with reference to cotton ties, and wire for baling and for fencing, and indeed for the agricultural implements included in the catch-all clause to which I have referred.

A third objection to the bill is that, without in fact reducing the price to the consumer of the articles admitted free in a number of the paragraphs, it gives an advantage to Canada, our neighbor on the north, which by withholding we might well use in the future to secure further concessions for us in the reciprocity agreement which the present Congress has requested me to expand.

Let me give the instances: Agricultural implements specifically mentioned in the bill are shown by a report of the Bureau of Trade Relations of the State Department to be cheaper in this country than anywhere in the world. This is confirmed by the fact that under existing law all countries admitting our agricultural implements free can have free access to our markets for the same articles. Great Britain is the only country whose present laws entitle her to this privilege, and which exports such articles in great quantity, and yet she exports practically none to this country. We urged Canada to consent to free trade in these articles in the reciprocity agreement, but she declined. Now it is proposed to give her free trade in them while she retains a duty of 15 per cent ad valorem on our agricultural implements. To admit her manufactures will not lower our prices, but it is giving her access to our markets for nothing, while we might use this privilege to secure some concession from her.

The same thing is true of that part of the present bill in which meat and flour are put on the free list for countries with whom we have a reciprocal agreement, and which receive free our agricultural products. This limits the admission of free meat and flour to Canada only. Meat in Canada and flour in Canada are as high as they are in the United States, and in many instances higher. We asked to have free trade in these two articles under the reciprocity agreement, but Canada declined, for the reason that she feared the effect of the competition of our meat packers and our flour mills with her packers and millers.

Now it is proposed to open this market to the Canadian packers and millers without our having access to the Canadian market. Such action will not reduce the price of meat or flour in this country. That is shown by the fact that they were afraid of our competition. In normal times their importations will have no effect on our markets, and hence the admission from Canada of meat and flour will be of practically no benefit to the consumer, but will offer an inducement to capitalists thinking of building mills or packing houses to put them on the Canadian side of the border, where they can have the advantage of both markets free. This is another instance in which the bill takes away from the President, in dealing with the matter of reciprocity, something that he might use in a trade to induce further reciprocity.

Another instance is in reference to the more finished kinds of lumber. Under our reciprocity agreement, rough lumber enters both countries free. Canada imposes 25 per cent duty on the more finished article, and we impose a duty of a different amount. If, now, we take off all duty on the finished product, we are giving her our market in this lumber for nothing, while we do not secure the benefit of hers; and we give to her Provinces a very strong motive for imposing restrictions and limitations on the cutting and export of rough lumber to this country in order to induce the transfer of the whole lumber manufacturing industry to Canada.

I withhold my approval from this bill, therefore, for the reasons, first, because it should not be considered until the Tariff Board shall make report upon the schedules it affects; second, because the bill is so loosely drawn as to involve the Government in endless litigation and to leave the commercial community in disastrous doubt; third, because it places the finished product on the free list, but retains on the dutiable list the raw material and the machinery with which such finished product is made, and thus puts at a needless disadvantage our American manufacturers; and fourth, that while purporting, by putting agricultural implements, meat, and flour on the free list, to reduce their price to the consumers, it does not do so, but only gives to Canada valuable concessions which might be used by the Executive to expand reciprocity with that country in accordance with the direction of Congress.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 18, 1911.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the veto message and move that the House on reconsideration agree to pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration agree to pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to agree with the gentleman from New York as to the time for general debate on the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. We are ready on this side to vote now. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will agree with the gentleman from New York to close debate after 15 minutes' debate on a side.

Mr. PAYNE. Can not the gentleman make it 10 minutes?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I will make it 10 minutes on a side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to close debate in 20 minutes, 10 minutes to be controlled by himself and 10 minutes by the gentleman from New York. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman from New York to use such time as he desires, as I will have but one speech on this side.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to submit the case on the message of the President of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.] He has analyzed this bill from beginning to end, and the best thing about that message is that every item of mistake, of bungling, in reference to this bill stated by the President is absolutely true. [Applause on the Republican side.]

No more bungling piece of tariff legislation was ever brought into the House by any party or by any set of men since the foundation of the Government. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is no man living, tariff expert anywhere, who can tell the effect upon the revenue that this bill has within $25,000,000, and he may guess from now until the time it will be enacted, which it never will be.

It does put on the free list articles of high-grade manufacture, where everything from which they are made now bears a duty. Take the Senate amendment embracing that highly finished article, Keene's cement, that you see in every new hotel, composing the columns, more beautiful and artistic than anything nature has produced in the way of marble. That is put on the free list, and it leaves the plaster rock from which all cement is made dutiable at 30 cents a ton. They wanted to make it harmonious with the bill as it went from the House. I have no idea of going through all the items of the bill, but, as I said yesterday, there is not a single item in this bill which they put on the free list where the material does not bear a duty, except, perhaps, lumber and cotton bagging; not only the articles that go to compose the things they put on the free list, but upon machinery by which it is made, they leave a duty, and a high duty on some of it.

Why, Mr. Speaker, I do wonder why our Democratic friends who received with such loud acclaim speeches of that departed statesmen, Mr. Foss, of Massachusetts, who asked, after the present law was enacted, that all the articles which he made be put on the free list, why, in the name of common sense, they have not put his manufactures on the free list. He manufactures blowers; not the kind that is used in the House, but blowers to take the dust away from manufacturing shops. He asserted here in the House that he could make blowers against the world, and I think he could blow against the world. But it did not seem to strike the astute chairman of the Ways and Means Committee or the exuberant gentleman from Kentucky, who wants to do away with the veto power; it did not even come into the brilliant brain of the gentleman from Alabama who was received with so much acclaim by gentlemen on the other side. They have entirely overlooked blowers, and they confine their free list to articles made from materials that bear a high rate of duty.

Then, there is another thing about it. They talk about the outrages of the present tariff law and the high duties. But, Mr. Speaker, they seem to have picked out for this bill articles that bear a low rate of duty, like shoes at 10 per cent and leather at 20 per cent, and they put upon the free list lumber, the duty of which we greatly cut and is less than 10 per cent. They put upon the free list, of course, cotton ties and cotton bagging, for this is in the interest of the cotton farmer, and, of course, the framers of this bill would look after the interests of the farmers that live in the beautiful Southland, which they so much love, even as they love the farmer.

They put agricultural machinery on the free list, and yet, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen who sell abroad agricultural machinery by the million year after year, the D. M. Osborne branch of the International Harvester Co., before it became a part of the International Harvester Co. and the great Harvester Co. since have testified time and again before the Ways and Means Committee that they sold all their products at a higher price abroad, both at wholesale and retail, than they were sold in the United States. Oh, but some gentlemen say this is the agent of an octopus, of a trust! Well, they offered to allow us to go in and see their books and said their books would show it. Once in a while, of course, you hear of a lone traveler who is a tariff reformer and a free trader and all that sort of thing, wandering around on the surface of the earth, finding some man who has a mower over in France, a second-hand machine, that he has bought at a low price, and he comes back and says that he could have saved $10 on his machine if he could only have purchased it in France and brought it over here. But the truth is that every one of these manufacturers get a better price abroad for their farm machinery than they get in the United States. Why, we have offered them a fair thing. Any country that will admit our farm machinery free will have their farm machinery admitted free into the United States. Still they do not seem to come in under those terms, and why not? Because we are selling it more cheaply here than it is sold abroad.

Some gentlemen come up and say that we confess the whole thing, that we do not need any tariff on anything because I say that we do not need a tariff on farm machinery. Mr. Speaker, farm machinery has been made in this country under patents for 50 or 60 years to my knowledge, improved on every year, and we make the finest in the world; we have the finest machines with which to turn it out, and we save big wages and have big stocks and have the best market in the world. The manufacturers of farm machinery have brought that industry up to that high stage of perfection in the way of manufacturing that they can sell and do sell to the American farmer for less than they sell abroad and for less than the shops that are abroad sell their machinery.

Great Britain manufactures farm machinery, but Great Britain, world-wide trader that she is, does not come in here with it. She can not compete with the farm machinery of the United States. You pick that out, thinking you are going to fool the farmers in the North with any such bosh as that. They know differently, they know they are getting their machinery cheaper, and if you could make your bill a law by any possibility they would prove the hollowness of your pretense. This is the great fake farmers' free-list bill. Why, there is not a thing in it for the farmer, not even meats, which you seek to get in free, but which, under your perfected bill, are free from Canada. It will neither hurt the farmer nor do him any good. If you had had your original proposition, it might have hurt, but the Senate took the teeth out of that and there is nothing in that. The President of the United States has stated clearly and forcibly and vigorously the faults in this bill of yours, bearing evidence of haste in its preparation, as he said, and I say that it was absolutely prepared with indecent haste and without judgment or discrimination. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the time at my disposal to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this day will ever be memorable in the history of the American Republic. It will emphasize the fact that a President of the United States, ignoring the fact that legislation was proposed for the great masses of the people, lined himself up squarely with the intrenched privilege of the country and denied the people relief from the burdens of infamous laws. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In the language of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] in the House the other day his opposition to legislation for the relief of the people is—

> That weird, insidious, conscientious, painstaking inquiry after facts which lasts long after the facts have been ascertained—that cushion-like opposition—an opposition more effective than Saladin put before the sword of the Knight of the Leopard.

No matter what is proposed to give relief to the people the President finds some excuse to deny it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Speaker, this House will not forget a day not long since when the gentleman from Alabama rose and called attention to the fact that the Wire Trust, in an attempt to coerce him in the discharge of his duty as a Member of this House, had shut down a great establishment in his district in order to influence his action here. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Unable to control the gentleman from Alabama, evidently a more susceptible person has been found elsewhere. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The message just read from the President of the United States points out the fact that the attempt to give free barbed wire for fencing might probably admit some other wire that will come in competition with the Wire Trust products.

Mr. Speaker, if I were a Biblical scholar I might recall a day of old, when Aaron was on the mount praying for the chosen people, and his hands were held up by Joshua and Caleb, two of his devoted followers, and I can well picture some gentlemen on that side of the House who until to-day have been voting in the interest of the people to give relief from the operation of the present iniquitous tariff law, now aided and assisted in their shift of position by four distinguished members of the Cabinet now present in this House to witness the peoples' holocaust. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Speaker, the President ignores entirely the interests of the people in this legislation. He thinks only of the manufacturer, he forgets the consumer; he is thinking of the profits of those who have so long enjoyed them under Republican legislation at the expense of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He insists that the farmers of the country shall be given competition in our market in their products with the products of other countries, and yet he refuses to take from them the burdens which are placed upon the implements they require in their avocation by the present tariff law.

He points out the fact that meat and flour and bread are higher in Canada than in the United States, and therefore it would be useless to give the markets of the United States to those who produce meat and flour and make bread in Canada, and insists that that must not be done until the people of Canada are put at the mercy of the Beef Trust and the Bread Trust of the United States just like our own people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The President states in his message on the wool bill that he was unable to obtain information to determine whether, under the provisions of the bill, sufficient protection would be afforded to those engaged in the various industries affected so as to meet the demands of the platform upon which he was elected. He now says this bill was carelessly drawn. Where did the President of the United States so recently obtain information to justify him in characterizing the language of any tariff bill? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let me call attention to something in connection with this hypocritical pretense that a report from the Tariff Board is necessary before any change should be made in the present tariff law with resulting relief to the people. I have in my hand the message of the President communicating a complete report of the Tariff Board on pulp wood and print paper, and that report shows that the cost of production in the United States is on the average $5.35 per ton higher than in Canada, and yet the President of the United States, so sensitive had he become to the criticism of a hostile press, insisted that a provision be put in the reciprocity bill which would put print paper and wood pulp upon the free list, not depending upon the action of the Canadian Parliament on the reciprocity agreement, but to be effective regardless of that action, in the hope that a hostile press might be silenced and he might evade just criticism of his actions. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why did not the President in the reciprocity bill insist that protection be afforded to the manufacturers interested in wood pulp and print paper?

Why should those engaged in the newspaper business be singled out by the President from all other classes of people for immediate relief from the operations of a tariff law, while those who are hungry and those who will suffer from the cold of winter must wait three or six months more until he makes up his mind as to whether he has sufficient information upon tariff matters to consent to legislation which is imperatively and almost universally demanded.

I have in my hand an editorial which appears in the New York World of to-day, and I shall insert it in the RECORD unless some Republican, fearful of its effect, will object. It calls attention to the fact that the President pointed out that the wool schedule was not changed in the last session of Congress because of a combination of the woolgrowers of the West and the woolen manufacturers of the East. To-day he occupies the position that that combination stood in during the last Congress to prevent the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Aldrich], both of whom believed that schedule too high to afford any relief to the people, by lowering the duties in it. He stated in a message to the Chicago Association of Trade, on the 3d of December, 1910:

> We are bound to promote the prompt elimination of instances of injustice in the tariff laws.

And by his own act he has glaringly postponed a proposition to eliminate one of the most indefensible features of our present tariff law. Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen upon that side of the House greeted with cheers and with yells the fact that by a few votes it was impossible to pass over the President's veto a wool bill highly meritorious and intended for the relief of the people. Those cheers, perhaps, may be repeated in a few moments, when the effort is made to pass over his veto this free-list bill. But those cheers will not die down here. They will not be silent when this House adjourns to-day. They will ring and ring in the ears of the American people until the people will arise in a justly indignant protest against the party which denies relief to them [applause on the Democratic side], and which insists upon injecting every buffer possible between the people and the relief to which they are entitled.

The President also in his message to-day calls attention to the fact that this free-list bill will give Canadian manufacturers an advantage over American manufacturers, and he says that if it were enacted into law it would result in interminable litigation. If anybody will take the trouble to secure the volumes of decisions which have been made necessary by Republican legislation, they will be convinced that no legislation will ever result in such a tremendous amount of decisions as resulted from their efforts.

Mr. Speaker, this day will not be forgotten; it will be remembered in November, 1912, to the detriment of the President of the United States and with resulting benefit to the country. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD at this juncture House Report No. 4 on this particular bill now under consideration by way of reply to the President's message.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD Report No. 4.

Mr. PAYNE. I object to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, then, under the general leave to extend remarks, I will print it, anyhow.

Mr. MANN. There is no leave under this bill, and will not be.

Mr. CLAYTON. There will be under the other bill. You can not keep it from being printed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert as part of my remarks the article to which I referred by suggestion and part of which I read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as part of his remarks the editorial from the New York World, part of which he read, but all of which he did not get the chance to read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the editorial referred to:

[From the New York World, Aug. 18, 1911.]

TO THE RESCUE OF PRIVILEGE.

By his veto of the wool bill Mr. Taft has deliberately put himself on the side of the extreme protectionists of his party.

The schedule of the Payne-Aldrich tariff which he denounced as "indefensible" he himself now defends against amendment by Congress. The very duties which he declared "should have been lowered" he alone now prevents Congress from lowering.

The taxes which he asserted were not lowered "because a combination of Representatives from the manufacturing and woolgrowing sections of the East and West had a majority in Congress that was overwhelming," are again not to be lowered, not because a majority in Congress opposes it, but because Mr. Taft opposes it. His veto serves the same purpose as the combination of Representatives from the manufacturing and woolgrowing sections served in retaining oppressive taxes.

Mr. Taft's veto of the wool bill makes waste paper of the pledge in his message of December 3, 1910, to the Chicago Association of Trade: "We are bound to promote the prompt elimination of instances of injustice in the tariff law." By his own act he has postponed indefinitely the elimination of a glaring instance of injustice which he had himself singled out for especial condemnation. He repeats that he shares in the "widespread belief that many rates in the present schedule are too high and are in excess of any needed protection for the woolgrower or manufacturer," yet he alone renders impossible the reduction of excessive and unnecessary taxes in accordance with the decision of Congress and in response to the will of the people.

In a few months the Tariff Board, a body without power or influence, a body held in absolute contempt by the high protectionists with whom Mr. Taft has taken sides, will report. Therefore nothing must be done. Therefore the abuses of the tariff must be maintained and injustice perpetuated. "There is no public exigency," says Mr. Taft in his message, "requiring the revision of Schedule K in August without adequate information, rather than in December next with such information." But there is such an "exigency" requiring "prompt elimination." Mr. Taft himself has told us so. We have "adequate information" that the wool schedule is "indefensible." That statement has the high authority of the President of the United States.

Mr. Taft has made a grave mistake. He has gone to the rescue of privilege when the people demanded relief. He has made himself personally responsible for the tax levied by organized greed and selfishness on the poor man's coat, the poor woman's dress, and their children's bed when it was in his power to lighten the burdens of those who labor that they may live.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration agree to pass the bill, the objection of the President to the contrary notwithstanding? The Constitution requires the roll to be called. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 227, nays 126, answered "present" 2, not voting 31, as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton, by adding provisions as to duties on steel, chemical, and mineral products, have contravened the true intent and purpose of that clause of the Constitution which requires that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives," and that the said bill, with the said amendments, be returned to the Senate with respectful notification of this objection of the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 3253) to authorize the counties of Yell and Conway to construct a bridge across the Petit Jean River.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the counties of Yell and Conway, bodies corporate under the laws of the State of Arkansas, their successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a steel drawbridge and approaches thereto across the Petit Jean River, a navigable stream, at or near Pontoon, Ark., along the Yell and Conway County lines, in the State of Arkansas, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable streams," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, before that question is taken, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia if the bill contains the usual provision that it is subject to the provision of the act regulating the construction of bridges over navigable streams?

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. Yes; it does.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I also move to lay on the table House bill (H. R. 10652) of similar title.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in order to save time, I desire to present a request for unanimous consent. There are a number of small bills on the calendar that gentlemen on each side of the House are interested in, and I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, which will give us an additional hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama whether it would not be more likely to pass the bills that are on the calendar purely of local importance if, by unanimous consent, it could be arranged that bills on the calendar which are not objected to may be considered, in which case it would not be necessary to meet ahead of the usual hour?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that I am not prepared to play favorites with these bills. They will all have to stand on their equal rights. If we can not have the meeting at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, we will have to have a session to-morrow night.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that a night session to-morrow is a pure thing of imagination, because there will be no quorum present, and that point will be raised.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

HOUSE BILL WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following House bill, with Senate amendments, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committtee, as indicated below:

H. R. 12812. An act to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

CODIFICATION OF LAWS RESPECTING THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged House resolution, No. 285, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina offers a privileged report, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 285.

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of Public Law No. 475, Sixty-first Congress, third session, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," be printed for the use of the House document room.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report (No. 153).

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration House resolution 285, providing for the printing of Public Law No. 475, Sixty-first Congress, third session, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The estimated cost is $154.22.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina offers a privileged report which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 18.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed 1,000 additional copies of the hearings of the special committee of the House of Representatives, appointed under House resolution 157 (62d Cong., 1st sess.) to investigate the American Sugar Refining Co. and others, for the use of the document room of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report (No. 152).

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration the House concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 18) providing for the printing of additional copies of hearings of special committee to investigate the American Sugar Refining Co. and others, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The estimated cost will be $1,387.53.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I notice this is a concurrent resolution——

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Has not each House the power to order these hearings printed? Is it not for the use of each House?

Mr. FINLEY. That has been done to the extent of 1,000 copies by the committee. The House can only order to the extent of $500, and this exceeds $500, because the 1,000 copies will cost, as stated, a little over $1,300.

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman from South Carolina agrees to the contention that the House, having ordered printed a document at a cost not to exceed $500, and that quota having been exhausted, it can not order the same thing printed again with the limit of cost of $500——

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman from South Carolina does not hold any such contention. The gentleman from South Carolina states this to be the law. The position of the gentleman from South Carolina is, that under the rules of the House and under the law the committee had the right to order 1,000 copies printed, no matter what the cost was. They have done that, and they have exhausted their authority in that respect. Now, for a reprint the House limitation is $500 under a House resolution and the joint committee's authority is limited to $200, so it requires a concurrent resolution, because the cost here is more than $1,300.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the Senate of the United States, by a simple order, orders, whenever they see fit, printing costing over $500, and on one occasion they ordered printed the history of this Capitol by a simple order that cost thousands of dollars.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit, there are many people in this country—I do not say I am one of them—who seriously——

Mr. MANN. Yes; there are many millions of people in this country——

Mr. FINLEY (continuing). Who seriously believe that the Senate of the United States is irresponsible at times. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. MANN. What I want to ascertain is whether under the practice it is possible for the Senate to order anything printed it wants to on a mere order of the Senate, but when the House wants something printed it has to go kissing the hand of the Senate and asking permission to have it printed.

Mr. FINLEY. I can only say this, Mr. Speaker, that I am not responsible for any violation of the law by the Senate of the United States or anybody else, and when anything comes to the Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives I will endeavor to carry out the law which the gentleman from Illinois and I helped to enact.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the Senate is violating the law; that is the custom——

Mr. FINLEY. I will say very frankly I do, using parliamentary language. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Does this resolution provide that this printing shall go to the document room or to the folding room?

Mr. FINLEY. To the document room. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois we are going to see that he gets a copy.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman why he did not ask that they go to the folding room so that every Member can get his pro rata share?

Mr. FINLEY. Because the cost will be about two and a half times as great.

Mr. NORRIS. Does it cost more to put a document in the folding room than it does in the document room?

Mr. FINLEY. The number of copies of a public document is 2,471. This provides for the printing of 1,000 copies.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not make any difference how many you provide for. You could provide by your resolution that it could go to the document room as well as the folding room.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman that he can rest assured he will get a copy, and so will every other Member of the House.

Mr. NORRIS. One copy may not be enough. As a matter of fact, if it went to the folding room every man would get a proportionate share of the publication.

Mr. FINLEY. The special committee making this investigation has had numerous demands, and they wish some for the use of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not have any objection to that, but here you are putting these thousand copies in a place where they could all be given out to a dozen different Members.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman that if he would accede to every demand, there would not be sufficient copies.

Mr. NORRIS. I admit that there is not anyone who would want many, but I presume every Member will get requests for a few of those documents.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not. I doubt if the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] will have a request for any.

Mr. NORRIS. I have a request for two or three copies already.

Mr. MANN. I think the special Hardwick committee has been very good about taking care of requests for any of these hearings.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not complaining about the committee. I am perfectly willing that the committee should have more, for that matter, than anybody else; but if this resolution passes it may be that some Members who have calls for them will not be able to get any.

Mr. MANN. I guess the committee gets them.

Mr. NORRIS. But the committee does not get them under this resolution.

Mr. MANN. Do as I have done, and write to the committee.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman will get a copy; he can rest assured of that. To supply everybody in this country under this resolution would cost too much money, and there is no necessity for it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I also offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 20.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed 1,000 copies of Hearings Nos. 9, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 18, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, and 31, before the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, House of Representatives, on H. Res. 109, to investigate the Post Office Department, for the use of the document room of the House of Representatives.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

In lines 11 and 12 strikes out the words:
"And a like number of such subsequent hearings of this committee as may be necessary."

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report (No. 154).

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration the House concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 20) providing for the printing of 1,000 copies of Hearings on House resolution 109, reports the same back to the House, with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to, with the following amendment: That in lines 11 and 12 the words "and a like number of such subsequent hearings of this committee as may be necessary" be stricken out.

The estimate of cost is $821.94.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FINLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the several resolutions were passed was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until 11 o'clock a. m., Saturday, August 19, 1911.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Attorney General, transmitting, in response to House resolution No. 217, information relating to a certain affidavit on file in said department (H. Doc.
